

Tax season reminds us of the impact that decisions made by Congress have upon our personal lives.

FRC's Policy, Media, and Government Relations teams work year-round to promote the interests of working families. Government is not the answer for every problem, yet countless laws – good and bad – will be considered in Congress this year. FRC will do all we can to ensure that the laws which pass will help preserve the dignity of life in our culture; increase the amount of time and resources that parents can invest in their children's lives and education; discourage the use of addictive drugs; attack AIDS effectively; protect children from being used in and exposed to pornography; and demonstrate to other nations that America values Biblical morals more than bottom-line profits.

To help you keep up-to-date, FRC offers a Directory of the 106th Congress. It lists all the Members of both Houses and their various committees, along with information you need in order to contact your representatives. We also offer

Guide to Government, a readable booklet describing pertinent details of the legislative process – and how each person can play a part in influencing this process.

For a summary of how the tax law was changed in 1997 to benefit working families, request a copy of Credit Where Credit is Due. This booklet also provides insight as to how Congress could make the tax law even more family-friendly. Order Credit Where Credit is Due free and you will also receive For Richer or for Poorer: the Federal Marriage Tax. This paper explains how it has come to pass that married couples pay more taxes than those who choose to cohabitate. It also suggests alternatives to this tax policy, which effectively discourages marriage and family – the building blocks of our society.
