NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It is very seldom that we find ourselves in even approximate agreement with Mr. Winston Churchill, but there is one passage in his Bradford speech of last Saturday which not merely justifies but completely supports the principle—I do not speak of detail—this is the last offer which his Majesty's Government can, or ought to make."

Our complaint is that the Government has been over-generous to the verge of weakness. Each separate county in Ulster shall poll to decide whether it shall be incorporated in Ireland or not. Such counties as shall vote for exclusion, even by a bare majority, shall be excluded for six years. At the end of that period these counties shall be included unless the Imperial Parliament forbids. In other words, at least two General Elections must be held before Ulster is handed over to the Irish Parliament; for it is expected that at least four counties, perhaps six, and two boroughs, will vote for exclusion. This generosity of Mr. Asquith's, in our view, is weak because a bitter Nationalist problem is certain to arise in every one of the excluded counties—there will be six Nationalist problems, and perhaps eight, instead of merely one. If the Opposition can squeeze the Prime Minister to this extent, why should they not be able to squeeze him a little more—to the extent, in fact, of a General Election? Mr. Churchill speaks as if he and the Government were in a strong position; but of course this week, as last, we write without knowing what Mr. Asquith may say on Monday. Even if the Government climbs down no further, the linen manufacturers of Belfast may again and again, the future of Ireland is mainly an economic problem; and antichronical religious bigotry, whether we hear of it from the Protestant counties or the Catholic ones, does not impress us. The sixteenth century is past. The Dublin Parliament will not answer this argument in the usual way by saying that land Protestants are not elected to municipal corporations, throughout England, for example, where the Church is strong, and especially in rural districts, what is the position of churchmen in Wales, or in Ulster; we simply point to this country. In districts the remark applies equally well to the Roman Catholics in Wales and Scotland. One of two things happens: in most cases the problems which have to be discussed by local bodies do not lend themselves to religious treatment, the least powerful sect suffers. We do not take into account the British Parliament at Dublin because Orangemen fear that something may happen which happens in Great Britain every day of the year. As for the plea that Ulster may be overtaxed, it will not hold water; there is no evidence that such a plea is justified. More than one article has appeared in The New Age pointing out that the rateable value of Leinster is higher than that of Ulster; and does anybody who has studied the history of Grattan's Parliament think for a moment that Ulster is unable to take care of herself? It is fast being realised that the Ulstermen are not defending their rights, but their privileges—their privileged position in economics, politics, and religion. To Mr. Redmond's assurances of justice the Ulstermen, if they told the truth, would reply in the words of the Kilkenny horse-thief on receiving similar assurances from his priest: "Sure, justice is the very thing I'm afraid of."

We said last week that no one had set down on paper an adequate definition of Federalism, and how difficult it was to criticise the Unionist plans in consequence. Mr. Ernest Barker's letter in the "Times" of March 12, in reply to Lord Hugh Cecil's letter published on March 5, gives us an inkling. Lord Hugh had complained that Home Rule would mean divided sovereignty; and he appealed to recent experience in South Africa, including the deportation of the nine Labour leaders, as an argument against such a division of power: "Mr. Harcourt's case for non-interference is just as unanswerable as the case against the Indemnity Bill. The truth is that the sovereignty is divided. It is only in theory and not in reality that the British Crown and Parliament exercise sovereignty in South Africa, except in purely external affairs. The true sovereignty in South Africa lies with the South African Parliament, and General Botha. Mr. Smuts is a home rule. Mr. Barker, in his reply, pointed out that Lord Hugh Cecil had adopted "the Austrian notion of a single central sovereignty, one and indivisible, and this sovereignty in its British manifestation he consecrates as the organ of ethical right." In other words, if the British sovereignty were infallible, and exercised undisputed power, he could define the right, whether he might be called upon to do so in Ireland or in South Africa. Mr. Barker, waiving the question of the infallibility of the British sovereign, had pointed out that this time been gravitating away from Austin and recognising that the sovereignty of a community may be (as it were) multicellular. . . . One has only to look at the British Empire, if that be recognised as a community, to see how 'multicellular' its sovereignty is. . . . It would be pointless to urge these theoretical considerations if it were not the fact that theory, even if it be not consciously apprehended, lies behind and tends to sway policy. Economic policy has been and is being swayed by Mill; political policy has been and is being swayed by Austin, whose principles lie at the basis of Unionism." —

In a very luminous passage Mr. Barker emphasises the fact that the spiritual life counts for more than the material life, that a new spiritual force has arisen in Ireland comparable to that which arose in North America in the eighteenth century, and that a living will, once it is born into the world, "must have its play." To define the limits of this play is impossible, in the case of a country such as ours, once the national will has been recognised. "Where a national will," adds Mr. Barker, "has come by recognition of itself as a national will, as it has in South Africa, nothing can stop it from doing wrong except its own sense of right and (behind that and reinforcing that) the common sense of men and women in the community. A national sovereignty is no safeguard." It follows that if the Government is prepared to take the "national" will of Ulster into consideration—as it has done by admitting the principle of exclusion, even if only for a time—it must likewise take into consideration the "national" will of Nationalist Ireland. We regard this letter of Mr. Barker's as a valuable contribution to a difficult political controversy: there are only two regrets in connection with it which we should like to express. One is that the Unionist Press and the Unionist Party have, throughout this controversy and other controversies, paid so little attention to their political philosophers; and the other is that Mr. Barker's argument did not warrant his referring to Austin at a little greater length. Our own set of Austin is not available at the moment, but we recollect that Austin distinguished between "sovereignty" and "political power," the former representing to him merely an abstraction, and the latter a very definite reality. It is a confusion of the two, we surmise, "even if he be not consciously apprehended," which has led both Unionists and Liberals to their mutually conceptions of Federalism. But unless the abstraction is kept in mind, the reality will be cast in the wrong mould. Theory, as not only Mr. Barker, but a score of contributors to this journal have emphasised, has over and over again, always precedes practice; and unless our principles are sound in theory our practice will be imperfect. The mistake of the Unionists is that they have entirely forgotten that if we knew, the principles of such Tory philosophers as have endeavoured to lay down principles. They profess that they know God; but in works they deny him, being abominable, and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate.

When we speak of British sovereignty in the abstract we mean, as we said last week, the maintenance of certain purely British traditions. Of these the submission to common principles of law is one; and the right to a speedily, fair, and open trial the other. These are principles of our own: they are part of our law. We say common principles of law, because the details may vary. The fact that Roman-Dutch law prevails in South Africa does not mean that this common principle, if we have referred to should not have been emphasised at the time of the granting of the South African Constitution. For what, after all, does the "granting" of a Constitution mean? It means that the Home Government, the central authority, is satisfied that the State which has submitted for approval is competent to maintain the justifications of the parent state. Missouri, to take an instance, was not admitted as a State of the American Union until its proposed Constitution (which, of course, had to be submitted for approval) had been so radically amended as to satisfy the central authority—i.e., Congress—that the new State could maintain and carry on such traditions as then existed in America. Under the South African Constitution, as was admitted even by General Smuts, the deportation of the Labour leaders was an illegal act. A Bill has now been introduced amending the Constitution with the object of making such acts legal in future. Under a proper system of Federal administration a Bill of this nature would have to be submitted to the Home Government, as in the case the Parliament at Westminster—for approval; and, unless our legislators had taken leave of their British senses, approval would not be given. But, supposing, this procedure were called for at present, and supposing the South African Government refused to conform to our usages and traditions? The answer to that is Lincoln and his determined and successful attempt to "restore the national authority." Does any one imagine, however, that an Irish Parliament at Dublin would ever be likely to be accused of such an essential violation of British law as that which the South African Parliament is at present engaged in considering? The chief fault of the last Irish Parliament was that it was corrupt, and that the northern minority had too much influence on its deliberations—so much influence, indeed, that the Catholics despaired of looking for emancipation from it, and frequently, through their leaders, advocated appeals to England for relief from their disabilities. There's a commentary on Ulster for you!

And now another word on Austin before we finish with him for this week. In a pamphlet which he published in 1859, he expressed the belief that they could never hope to acquire political power and influence because their economic condition forbade it; and that if they did at any time attain political power they would probably use it chiefly for the purpose of attacking the wealthy. This was a very considerable advance on Ricardo, and very nearly an anticipation of a principle upon which New Age contributors have been laying stress for some time. It is for the Tories to say whether this piece of political "philosophy" appeals to them, and to tell us whether they really believe that Unionism is being influenced by Austin's opinions. The view we have just quoted may be taken in conjunction with an unusual debate in the House of Lords on Thursday last on the subject of national defence. Lord Willoughby de Broke proposed the second reading of a Bill making military service compulsory on the higher classes of the country and optional for the lower classes; and for the sake of convenience the House of Commons' salary of £400 was fixed as the lowest limit of the "higher classes," which were, however, for the purpose of the Bill, to include young men being educated at the universities and public schools or "belonging to the professions. With the military details of the Bill, which are open to considerable criticism, we do not wish to deal; but we do wish to call attention to a sentence or two from a couple of speakers. Lord Willoughby de Broke said that "there was a considerable number of people who, as far as he could see, have been, and are, absolutely useless in their own amassing wealth. These were the kind of people he wanted to get hold of and drill... The desire to work for the common good was not the exclusive property of the rich or the comfortable classes. It was in poor homes, not in rich ones, that they would find real patriotism." Lord Joicey, a Liberal peer, said that "He did not approve of the Bill because he thought any form of compulsion should be applied to all. How many men were practically loafers, men who would neither work nor help their struggling farmers, yet the Bill missed them altogether."

We regard Lord Willoughby de Broke's proposal as being, at the present time, quixotic, and Lord Joicey's comments as scandalous. The suggestion that the gentlemen of the country should come forward to form an army of defence is plausible and ingenious; but where are the gentlemen? It may be possible that, scattered here and there throughout the length and breadth of England there may be some survivals of the old families, noble or otherwise, who still take care of their dependents and labourers, help their struggling farmers, and refuse to associate with the plutocracy; though we have heard of few instances of such gentlemen. On the other hand, the English nobility has invariably shown about the time a nobleman can do towards alleviating the obvious distress in the country is to stand up in the House of Lords and jeer at "corner-boys" and "loafers." But what gives rise to such a class are the classes composed of corner-boys and loafers? What but the demand of all the Joiceys in industry that there shall always be a certain surplus of labour to call upon when trade is brisk, and to keep wages down to subsistence level whether trade is brisk or not?

We can look for no remedy from peers of the Joicey stamp. Such men under the Brahmins would have been in the lowest caste but one at the best of times; and if they had not shown sufficiently high principle for the vaishyas they would have been put among the sudras. But what of the older aristocracy; what of Lord Willoughby de Broke and his class? This is a class with all the advantages our aristocratic order can confer: culture, wealth, social influence, leisure, political power and authority. Yet what does this class do, what results does it show? Where are the signs of its intelligence? An answer to these questions would not be satisfactory, and would not reflect credit on even the "best" section of our aristocracy. We cannot name a single peer who has shown any appreciation of the cause of England's moral degeneracy during the last hundred years or so, who has examined the wagesystem, who even knows that there is a thing which economists call by that name, who is familiar with the details of any one type of Labour unrest, or has even taken the trouble to inform himself on any question relating to our modern social organisation. How many peers are familiar with the causes and consequences of the recent strike in South Africa? How many have read or sought to ascertain the full history of the London dock strike in 1911, the miners' strike in 1912, or the builders' strike which is at present going on? How many of them, above all, ventured to criticise the Insurance Act; how many of them could have done so with a familiarity arising out of an appreciation of the principles that measure and its probable effect, moral and economic, on the English people? Not one. The "noble" classes may complain to their heart's content of the "plutocratic" classes; but they have only themselves to thank for their own decadence and for the entire lack of faith which the working classes are now showing in all branches of the "aristocracy."

The degradation of the "Times" to a penny has been brought about by causes not unlike those which have led to the general attack on the House of Lords. For years the "Times" remained, like the Lords, in an arrogant and lofty position of self-conferred superiority, breathing hostility to the "lower classes," and furthering, consciously or not, the interests of the Whig capitalists. Here and there in the literary supplement one sometimes came upon a scholarly review; but in other respects the "Times" had degenerated even when Lord Northcliffe bought it a few years ago. If there are any members of the Walter family left, they must surely regret that they did not associate some Jew with themselves before the founder of the "Daily Mail" stretched his tentacles in the direction of Printing House Square. In recent years the "Times" has been worth buying only because of the letters addressed to it by well-known people; and such letters were addressed to the "Times" only because it was living on its ancient prestige. Its cabled foreign news, for which it was once famous, is now far excelled by that of the "Daily Telegraph"; its foreign news received by letter is greatly inferior to what may be read in the columns of the "Morning

Indeed, one of the funniest statements we have heard for some time is the announcement of one or two newsagents to us that some of their customers are now taking the "Times" and cancelling their orders for—the "Daily Mail"!

We have seen, just before going to press, one of those articles by Mr. W. H. Massingham which make it difficult for us, when we read them, to know whether he should be accused of stupidity or humbug. The article, which appears in Monday's "Daily News," proceeds to be an attempt to sum up the present political situation, and it contains a few passages which are remarkably contradictory. For example, we are solemnly warned that the Tories are attempting to subvert the great principles of Liberalism by thwarting the Parliament Act, and that "either we set our faces to two new ideas of popular government, a self-respecting, well-nurtured people, with enough money, leisure, health and freedom to claim comradeship, let us say, with the Australian worker, or we sink back to government by classes on the old lines tempered by an occasional sop to progress." If things are in such a bad way as this, why does Mr. Massingham add: "There are only two forces that count in half the electoral field in Great Britain. They are Liberalism and Labour. I am told that in more than one recent election the Tory candidate hardly came into the discussion, save with the strike of Sydney butchers only a few days ago, and, unless the "great schemes" dear to the "Daily Mirror's" new Serial. As everybody in the diplomatic world is by this time tired of listening to grave rumours of wars, the latest little scare which the German papers have been trying to work up has not been heeded. It is nevertheless of much interest; for papers such as "Germania" and the "Könische Zeitung" do not publish fearsome articles without at least official connivance, if not official instigation. I wish to take advantage of this scare to set down in print some few items of news which have not yet been published, but without which the scare cannot be properly understood.

The facts known may be briefly summed up. On March 2 the "Könische" published a message from its correspondent at St. Petersburg showing that by 1917 Russia would have completed her new military preparations, with the result that several hundred thousand men would be added by that year to the Russian army, and that the German Army Bill would be effectively counteracted. This fact, however, was perfectly well known to all Europe; but, as the "Könische" was known to be an "inspired" journal, the markets became uneasy, and they became still more uneasy when "Germania" announced with a shriek that Russia was mobilising, and mobilising, undoubtedly against Germany and Austria. The agitation against Russia then spread to the Austrian Press, and the Russian Government, being unnerved, put out an announcement in the "Rossiya" that Russia is merely preparing her new military pre-arranged programme and is not directing her forces against Germany in any sense.

We know already, of course, that the Germans have recently taken steps to increase their army, some 250,000 to 300,000 men having been added to the regular forces. To counter this move, the French Government passed a law authorising the extension of the military service from two years to three. The result of this measure was—we can only speak approximately—that the French were able to oppose a peace strength of 700,000 men to a German peace strength of 875,000 men. The Germans, however, had had still a much larger reserve to draw upon; for they were calling up, even under their new scheme, only about 50 per cent. of their available men, while France was calling up about 75 per cent. to 80 per cent. Where could the remainder be found; how could the balance be re-dressed? Clearly enough, they could be found if Russia were willing to help her ally.

It happened—I now come to what has not been known hitherto—that about this time the Russian Government wanted a large French loan, chiefly for the purposes of building strategic railways. An ingenious plan was adopted for getting this money without arousing German hostility. The Russian Government did not apply for the loan officially; but it was arranged that the money should be advanced, as required, to private Russian railway companies, who will, of course, build their "extensions" exactly in accordance with the wishes of the Government. The French Government would not promise to open the Bourse to this new loan unless the new strong German defences were taken into consideration. As the result of lengthy discussions, it was agreed that in return for a loan of a hundred millions advancing the Russians should carry up a larger percentage of recruits than they had hitherto been doing. Arrangements were at once made, and the result is that the Russian army, in less than two years, will have 408,000 more men.

It is not merely on the additional men that I would lay stress. The French money of which Russia has been able to take advantage has been well spent. Very careful attention has been devoted to the training of the officer corps, and as far as possible the inefficients who disgraced the Russian arms during the war with Japan have been weeded out. Many improvements have been effected in the field and siege artillery, old guns have been scrapped, and every unit of the army has been provided with modern weapons. Furthermore, all the fortresses on the German border have been overhauled and strengthened, and the latest inventions, such as military automobiles and "aerial Dreadnoughts"—a type of large aeroplane for war purposes invented by a Russian officer—have been added to the army.

In these circumstances it is not at all astounding that the German "National-Zeitung" should give publication to a report that a new Army Bill will shortly be introduced in the Reichstag, authorising the re-arming of the artillery at a cost of £25,000,000. It is suggested in some quarters that the war scare in the German Press is being carried on at the Government's wish in order that the passage of such a Bill may be hastened and that the Bill itself may meet with little Socialist opposition. This is partly true; but it would be better to add that the German Chancellor, Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg, would like to see the Reichstag dissolved at an early date, so that the Government might at least have a sporting chance of securing a better majority in consequence of the revived spirit of imperialism.

To the semi-official statements in the Russian Press that the Tsar's Government has no intention of directing an attack to be made upon Germany I can give my most cordial confirmation. Russia has no intention of attacking Germany when her object, on the next declaration of war, is Constantinople. The Young Turks, having parcelled out Asia Minor among European con-
Military Notes.
By Romney.

Furdan’s “Daily Mail” contained an interesting letter from Lord Charlmont on the subject of the Ulster Volunteers. It appears that some person or persons have been going about proclaiming that the force in question is the equal of the British Regular forces, and to this Lord Charlmont replies that he is an Ulster Volunteer himself, very naturally objects as “likely to throw ridicule upon the Volunteer Force in the eyes of all sensible people,” and he proceeds to give a short idea of what its efficiency really amounts to. “We are at present,” he says, “unable to gauge our utility in practical warfare, but it must be remembered that a far smaller body of men, who had never done a battalion drill in their lives, gave very considerable trouble to the Regular Army in South Africa.”

Some time ago, if my memory serves me, I remarked upon a statement that the tactics of the U.V.F. demand that he forces to be going to be Boer tactics. I said, and I will repeat, that if the Nationalists had any military perceptions, they would pray earnestly that this rumour was true, for, if it were, the U.V.F. was as good as beaten in advance. I cannot say, of course, what resistance the Ulster Volunteers would put up if properly handled. Personally, I should say, a very good resistance—but of this I am sure, that if they are handled like Boers, they will put up no resistance at all. A brigade of Regulars will walk through the lot of them.

The Boer successes were due to one quality—superior mobility acting in a practically unlimited field. It should be obvious to everyone that if you can move faster than your enemy, and are not tied by political or supply considerations to the defence of any particular point, you can cause him a great deal of damage by attacking him in overwhelming force at any point that seems suitable. But you must be the more mobile—otherwise he can reply in the same coin—and the field must be unlimited and contain no point of vital importance to you—otherwise he can force you to stand and fight at the place of his choice by simply marching on the point in question. Again, in order to possess the superior mobility in question, your men must be so constituted as to be able to live on very little—otherwise you will be hampered, as the British were in South Africa by slow-moving trains of supplies—and they must be sure of being able to live on the country and maintain themselves as they go along.

Now let us see how these conditions are fulfilled in the case of Ulster. The Ulster Volunteer is certainly not more movable than the Regular soldier, and he is in all probability less. He does not, like the Boer, possess a handy and enduring mount which will carry him anywhere in any weather, and, being a comparatively untrained civilian, he will not be able to use his feet to such advantage as Regular troops. So much for his mobility, which is the first requisite in Boer tactics. As regards the “practically unlimited area,” which we agreed was also necessary, the Boers had a field of operations equal in size to Germany and France. The U.V.F. will be cooped up in the N.W. corner of Ireland, where it will just about be able to deploy in any weather; and, being a comparatively untrained body, it will be limited and unable to contain no point of vital importance to the enemy. Indeed, is about the one place in England where Ulster can be cooped up, and the field must be limited and contain no point of vital importance to the enemy.

As for what tactics Ulster should adopt, I think the answer is plain. The men are still half-trained, although it should be remembered that they have now all been at it a considerable time, and that the units should therefore have “found themselves” to some extent. In the event of actual fighting they would have the advantage of a definite, easily understood, and, to the majority of them, very real cause. In other words, enthusiasm and determination should be easily generated. Troops of this sort are no means useless. Employed in the vain attempt to imitate Boers and Red Indians they would simply go to pieces, but properly handled by leaders who understood how to generate and to employ that crowd impulse which is the motive power of modern armies, they should prove very formidable. It must be remembered that a large proportion of the officers are Regulars—or ex-Regulators. The right tactics for Ulster are the mass tactics of the Greeks and Bulgarians, the bulk of whose men were no better trained than they are, and who relied, as they should rely, upon the driving force of genuine emotion.

As for the Government, and the line which they should pursue, to employ the Army would be a last resort, since the officer class is far more permeated with Carsonism than the rest of the community—the Army, indeed, is about the one place in England where Ulster is taken seriously—and there would at once result desertions and resignations or attempts at resignation, which would destroy discipline for years to come, perhaps for ever. It is that which makes the Ulster question so serious from the standpoint of the governing classes. At a moment when labour troubles and foreign disturbances render a loyal and united Army more necessary to them than at any other period for two hundred years—at that moment they are faced with the possibility of having to take action which will split their Army in twain, drive many of their most capable officers into opposition, and sow dissension and indiscipline among the remainder. For that reason we may say for certain that the Regular Army will not be employed in Ulster. But Protestant Ulster is Belfast—a city situated upon the sea-coast and open to naval bombardment. Such a step would be cruel and desperate; but it would pay our rulers better in the long run than to provoke a schism in the ranks of their armed forces.
The Postal Telegraph Service.

By A Postal Worker.

People who watched and hoped for epoch-making developments from that phase of Postal agitation which the "Press" was pleased to dub a "crisis," and which was heard of most during the Christmas tide, must surely be perplexed at the silence that has so suddenly made the necessary allowances and have a fair idea of appreciating that the real "crisis" may not arrive for the workers. The calculated more papers, but "Postal Workers Stricken" the present situation. At any rate they will readily accept a by-election on Home Rule, and goodness knows what-not. With the recent Cabinet changes off our dear leaders to sip tea with Mr. Herbert Samuel and to bid him felicitous farewell, and to lickspittle to Mr. G. H. Stuart (as paid secretary to the Postmen's Federation), and to meet the annual conference of the Postal Telegraph Clerks' Association to be held in London on April 13, 14, 15, and 16. There are dozens of others on the agenda, but I have extracted the following as being of greatest interest to your readers, as well as being in my opinion, the most important down for discussion.

The first one, on the face of it, would appear to be a genuine piece of advice on what is certainly a debatable subject, but two very important points must be borne in mind. The National Joint Committee (N.J.C.) has used executive powers throughout the Holt agitation as dishonest in manner as they have been fruitless in result. The other point is this, and it is undoubtedly for this reason that the resolution is forthcoming from the Executive Committee. If it is passed at Conference the P. and T.C.A. will be sheered from amalgamation with the other Postal Associations, a scheme which will be then proceeded with, and which will encumber the association with a set of outside-officials at the expense of nearly a thousand pounds per annum.

Here it is:

That this Conference desires that, if the appointment of any permanent General Secretary be inopportune, and this Conference agrees to the demission of such appointment until negotiations are completed.—Stockport.

Appendix I:—That this Conference desires that, if the person elected for General Secretary be in the Service, his removal from the Service be deferred until such time as the question of the general amalgamation of Postal societies is settled.—Liverpool (Postal).

Then comes a demonstration of "Executive" intelligence. The following is taken from its re-draft of the Association "platform" or "programme," which also comes up for acceptance or rejection. It is perhaps unnecessary to remind your readers that a "Control of the Service" resolution was carried at the Conference of the P. and T.C.A. two years ago. Observe how this has been bundled out; either the executive brain cannot..."
grasp the principle, or it promises too much work and too little limelight for Parliamentary aspirants.

The establishment of periodical inquiries into the pay and conditions of Postal workers.

The establishment of the principle of arbitration in questions of application of the findings of such periodical inquiries, of the carrying out of official regulations, the introduction of new regulations, etc.

Questions of demarcation of work to be decided by committees composed of representatives of the Staffs concerned and of the Department; failures to agree to be submitted to arbitration at the instance of any two of the parties concerned.

Compare this with the following; happily the rank and file had a very good idea of how far its “leaders” could be trusted in the business.

This Conference recognises the futility of Parliamentary or Select Committees of Inquiry or Arbitration and Conciliation Boards, each of these being at best but a means of making the present system of society intolerable to the workers, and declares that no permanent improvement of labour is possible, except by the abolition of the wage system. That our efforts, therefore, be directed to the extension of the principle of official recognition, leading up to partnership with the State in the management and control of the Postal Service.—Leeds (Postal).

That the Post Office be managed by the people employed in it on a basis of popular control.—Hull (Telegraphs).

That the ultimate object of the P. & T.C.A. shall be the control of the Post Office undertaking, in conjunction with all Postal Associations.—Manchester (Telegraphs).

That an item of the programme of the P. & T.C.A. shall be as follows: “To attain a greater measure of control over the conditions under which members of the Association are employed.”—Hull (Postal).

Despite the arrogance of the Holt Report, this Conference reaffirms its belief in joint control of the Post Office between the State and the Postal workers.—Birmingham (Telegraphs).

It will be remembered that the N.I.C. expressed the opinion that the solution to the Postal grievances lay in the election of five or six Postal men to Parliament.

That this Conference decides that no servant of the Association can be permitted to become a candidate for Parliament, and that this be embodied in any agreements entered into.—Leeds (Postal).

That if any emergency fund is formed by this Association, no part of it shall be in any way devoted to furthering the election of any candidate for Parliament or of supporting or subsidising a member of Parliament.—Newcastle-on-Tyne (Postal).

New Rule:—That any official of the Association shall automatically resign his position on being nominated as a candidate in a Parliamentary election.—Carlton Room, London.

That this Conference pledges itself to formulate a strike policy.—Birmingham (Telegraphs).

The movement has been “forcefully fed” with Political Action so far, it is to be hoped these resolutions will lead to its being spurred up for ever.

For those who hope for the ultimate establishment of a Postal Guild in the future, the following resolutions will have some significance.

That this Conference of the Postal and Telegraph Clerks' Association condemns the Departmental policy of transferring work to lower-paid classes and so effecting economy at the expense of the wages paid to Post Office workers.

This Conference further invites the Controlling Officers' Association and the Postmen's Federation to co-operate with the P. & T.C.A., “fighting any further attempt at devolution of work.—Glasgow (Postal).

The 1914 Conference of the P. and T.C.A. should not be dull for want of material for debate. Some of these resolutions will undoubtedly be passed, others will probably be defeated. Those which do get through will have to run the gauntlet of our “Postal Ramsay MacDonals.” However, much can be said of them. Whatever happens to them now or in the near future, they will have their day later. If they are defeated now they will be carried later, if they are carried now they will be reiterated until . . . ah ! until !

Education for the Workers.

By Rowland Kenney.

I.

If the New Age had not clearly shown during the past two years that the worker is not only an actual slave under modern industrial conditions, but that he is so regarded by his masters, the effects of recent Liberal legislation must soon have made the fact apparent.

The National Insurance Act and, indeed, almost every Labour measure introduced into Parliament since 1906, has been framed for the obvious purpose of stamping the worker with the brand of servility, and endeavouring to organise, legalise, and perpetuate a slave class. That the “Daily News” will call this class organised democracy when it is fairly well sorted up, docked, and divided out among the profiteers is more than probable; but that will in no way improve the condition of the slaves. This fact must be so patent to every reader of the New Age that I do not intend to spend much space upon it; what I am concerned with is the question of how the working classes are to be organised and driven during the process of transformation, if they allow that process to go on.

A common saying among social reformers of every shade of colour is that labour is now so well educated that it will not tolerate such evil conditions as were imposed upon the workers of an older generation, and all the social reformers are agreed that more and more education must be shoved into the workers. “Nothing can be done without an Educated Democracy.” Some of these reformers are all for technical education; boys must be sent to evening continuation schools where they will be taught some trade or craft which will fit them for skilled work and prevent them from drifting into the gutter of the unskilled labour market. Another type of working class educationists asks for a system of education which simply presents facts and which will make workers into “decent citizens”—or, in short, “cultured” prigs. A third class says that a plain, unbiassed system of education for the working classes is almost an impossibility, and, if it is made possible, it will be of no earthly use to the workers so far as performing their obvious duty of freeing themselves from wagery is concerned.

Before going on to deal with these educationists I must again consider the recent trend of political and industrial affairs. The Socialist for long demanded State ownership of everything; nationalisation was to be the cure for all social ills. After much effort he so far convinced a minority of the people that a few keen-nosed politicians, with Lloyd George at their head, decided to give a sop to the nationalisers. So these politicians, happening to be in power, proceeded some years ago to nationalise—working men! They made no attempt to transfer private property or wealth to the State, they put no restrictions upon the power of landlord or capitalist to extract rent or profit from labour; they simply said: we must organise the workers in such a way that the State—that is, we ourselves—can grip batches of these wealth-producers and place them wherever the profiteers who finance us may require. They did not say this openly, of course; what they said openly was that they would provide for the workers "a new heaven and a new earth." But it was impossible for the politicians and their paymasters to do this without an army of helpers, so a host of State officials was created. How many men the Labour Exchanges have absorbed, how many have been given posts under the National Insurance scheme, and how many are employed in dealing with young wage-slaves on Juvenile Advisory Committees and the like, I do not know; but it is as certain that these officials are actually or in training as slave-drivers as if they had been armed and set in authority over gangs of men on jobs. They are armed, but with pens and ink, and printed instructions and reports, instead of whips; behind them they have the whole forces of the Crown.

The concentration of capital into fewer and fewer hands, the degrading of hosts of workers into mere machine-tenders, and the elimination of large masses of middlemen is making the rapid reclassification of men, other than owners, more and more necessary. The State wherein there shall be the owners and enjoys of wealth, the slave producers of wealth, and the State-organised organisers and keepers of the slaves, is being hastened as rapidly as it can be by an unscrupulous State wherein there shall be the owners and enjoyers of wealth, the slave producers of wealth, and the State-organised organisers and keepers of the slaves, is being hastened as rapidly as it can be by an unscrupulous capitalist class, a subdued Press, a corrupt legislature, and an apathetic public with but a small sprinkling of active, honest men.

One of the chief difficulties in the organisation of this State was the procuring of a sufficient number of men fitted for the posts of slave guards. Not every superfluous middle-class man is competent to be a State official of the Lloyd Georgian type. The business training of middlemen and industrial hangers-on is not of much use when it comes to sorting up and generally deceiving and mentally drugging artizans, so another type of man was required, and the most adaptable type for this kind of work was the social reformer of bureaucratic tendencies. And not only is this getter-on of use to the creators of the slave state because of his natural abilities for prying into the private concerns of working people, because he has some knowledge of politics and social affairs, and because he has a natural aptitude for compiling statistics and classifying men as if they were lumps of metal or clay, but in giving him jobs the Lloyd Georges are annihilating him as a potential attacker of vested interests. For it is undoubtedly a fact that hundreds, perhaps thousands, of jobs have been found for active young Fabians and Socialists of other schools because Government money would "keep them out of mischief." The creation of official posts for drivers and cozeners of labour has also been of use in another way. The intelligent worker who has practically no chance of becoming anything but a "hand" at his trade has a tendency to become an active, and consequently dangerous, trade unionist. He realises that his only hope of improving his lot is by helping to improve the lot of the whole of his class, and that does not suit his masters or their political patrons. He is driven off from the general apathetic body of labour and set as a spy upon his old workmates from behind the desk in a Labour Exchange office or similar contraption. The excellence of this arrangement from every point of view—from every employer's point of view—is apparent; so now we can return to the question of education.

Now what must be the aim of education so far as the workers are concerned? It seems to me that the first necessity is for labour to be taught how to prevent any further encroachments being made upon its liberties by the profiteers; then to be given some understanding of economics, politics, and all the social forces which have gone to the building up of power in the hands of the few; finally, the workers should learn to develop schemes for the transformation of our present hughen-mugger of commercialism into a decent workers' commonwealth. All the time it must fight and fight, and learn to fight more and more scientifically than it has ever done in the past.

It would appear from the letter which Mr. Mackey recently contributed to your columns that I have not yet sufficiently made clear the perils which confront art in modern society, for Mr. Mackey questions the truth of my assertion that art would entirely disappear from the modern world if anything is done which alters the position of the wealthy class. Mr. Mackey asks "whether it is not almost certain that traditions of good work will arise even among the building trades when security, comfort and leisure enable a man to take pride in his work?" To that I must answer that it is by no means the case. Security, comfort and leisure are certainly conditions which make for the production of good work, but they are by no means the only conditions. Architects in public offices to-day enjoy these advantages as a rule in a far higher degree than do architects in private practice, but they do not on that account turn out good work. The great mass of work turned out of such offices is beneath contempt, while as often as not it enjoys the contempt of the very men who do it.

The reason for this is that architects in public offices are oppressed by the dead weight of officialism. A man working under such conditions loses his enthusiasm, and when that happens it is that inspiration which generates into a mere time-server. He loses his independence, and independence is the breath of life in art. Independence is fundamental; security, comfort and leisure are secondary to it.

In these circumstances, in considering the form of organisation which will be necessary in the future, if we have a regard for the welfare of art we must before all take care to guarantee independence to the artist and craftsman. And the surest way of doing this is for him to work as a small master on his own account. Guilds organised on the mediaeval basis seem to me to offer this guarantee. For not the least among their virtues was that it secured an equitable distribution of work. There is a limit to the quantity of work which any man can do well, and the Medieval Guilds provided that that limit should not be passed. In our day a man always has too much or too little to do. It seems impossible in the absence of Guild regulations for him to get just the right amount. But this does not do away with all the difficulties. There are the difficulties inherent in the stage of transition. The ordinary trade craftsman of to-day, where he survives, generally knows the technical side of his craft, but he knows nothing about its aesthetic side. The problem is how to bring that knowledge to his art. And this is no easy matter, for the very idea as to what does and what does not constitute aesthetic excellence has vanished utterly from his mind. How to find a remedy for the poverty of the soul is as difficult as how to find a remedy for economic poverty. We are not justified therefore in assuming that because with independence, security and leisure came naturally to the craftman of the Middle Age it would come as naturally to the modern workman if he could be given these conditions. At any rate the immediate effect would only be to increase the prevailing confusion. The sensible course to pursue would be to make the transition as gradual as possible—to allow the influence of the small group of artists and craftsmen to spread until the entire community is leavened. This of course is the natural policy, but in the meantime there are certain obstacles in the way. The market for art and craftsmanship has become so disorganised that for the vast majority of artists success or failure resolves itself into a pure matter of chance. Nobody can plan, nobody can organise. The situation has become so complex that it has become incalculable. Every one has come to depend upon luck, and craftsmen and artists have become like a regiment
Law and Government in a British Protectorate.

By Alfred E. Randall.

The recent deportation without trial from South Africa of the nine Trade Union leaders was an apparently illegal act of the Executive, from the consequences of which the Executive has attempted to protect itself by an Indemnity Act. The legality of its action will be tested in the English courts; for executive exile (which is only a variation of the Russian administrative exile) is not the most desirable addition to the prestige of a Government. But it may not be generally known that the power used with doubtful legality by the South African Government has all the sanction of a legislative enactment in the Federated Malay States. I learn from "Art as a Factor in Social Reform," 1914, addressed to J. H. M. Robson, Esq., by a Member of the Bar of the Federated Malay States, "that there are about a score of these Acts in existence, and that the Government passes a new one almost every year. The Federated Malay States are a British Protectorate, and the existence of these Acts reminds us how quickly Englishmen may forget the traditions of liberty and the principles of law of which we boast when denouncing Russian autocracy or the "terrible law of suspicion" of the French Revolution.

The legal principle implied by Habeas Corpus, for example, one would have thought was ingrained in the constitution of every Englishman. "This Act [the Habeas Corpus Act of 1679], reinforced as it was by the civil remedies applied in the well-known 'General Warrant' cases at the end of the eighteenth century, may be said to have definitely established in England that 'Rule of Law' which is the chief guarantee of English liberty. For both statutes and common law are based upon the principle, that even an official acting under the authority of the Crown must show definite legal authority for any act which interferes with the personal freedom or domestic privacy of the ordinary citizen." The quotation is from Mr. Edward Jenks' "Short History of English Law." The principle implied by Habeas Corpus is evaded in South Africa by the Indemnity Act—in the Federated Malay States, it is evaded by the Banishment Enactment Act, 1910; for the principle of Habeas Corpus is simply that a man shall not be subject to arbitrary arrest or imprisonment, but shall be brought for trial before the legal tribunal. These Banishment Acts of the F.M.S. revoke this principle.

"To the Resident of every State," says Mr. H. N. Ferrers in the "Open letter" to which I have referred, "is given the power of arresting and imprisoning any person alien or native whom he may find within the State. After anyone has been arrested, he can be kept in prison for an indefinite period, during which he is not allowed to hold any communication with him until the Resident has made up his mind whether to banish him or not. As soon as this is decided, he is informed that he is banished either for life or for a term of years; and placed on board a ship. The ship carries a "Warrant," under which the Resident may think desirable. This arbitrary power is not limited to the Resident; he may depute to him who pleases; and the written information of the Secretary for Chinese Affairs, or of the Chief Police Officer, the Superintendent of the Convict Establishment, or a District Superintendent of Prisons, is sufficient to secure the banishment of any person from the Federated Malay States.

The possession of this arbitrary power must, it is obvious, tend to corrupt the administration of this Protectorate. It is in the interest of the Federated States that Mr. Ferrers should have been able to begin his letter with the suggestive passage: "My dear Robson,—You will remember how some time ago, when we were discussing who was likely to be appointed the next member of the Federal Council, you told me that the Government would never appoint me..."
a member of that or any other public body because of the attitude I had taken up upon the question of Banishment."

This is bad enough, for it illustrates the petty tyranny that is always associated with the exercise of arbitrary power. It enables the Government officials to adopt. "In the dead of night," says Mr. Ferrers, "the accused man is arrested and carried off to gaol. Some of his friends come round and consult me as to what can be done. I go round to his house and find his wife, or wives, in tears, his business in utter confusion and disorder, and everybody connected with him in a state of mingled panic and utter at a loss what to do. I visit some exalted Government official, and represent to him the state of affairs as it actually is. 'Oh! is the only reply vouchaused to me by the eminent being from the other side of his official desk. If the case is a really serious one, I may not yet be completely frozen into silence; but may again repeat my representations in a stronger form and finish up with actually imploring that he may disclose some information as to the nature of the charge hanging over my client and all his probable fate, but whatever he says makes no difference, and the only answer I get from the exalted Government official is a somewhat long-drawn but none the less emphatic, 'No'!

It is necessary to the success of English administration of foreign States, that it should be conducted with the utmost courtesy. It cannot resist the reinforcement of arbitrary power provided by statute; and the consequences of its exercise are not always the most desirable in the interest of English administration of foreign States. An instance given by Mr. Ferrers will illustrate what I mean. 'You will remember a time some years ago when the Chinese population throughout the States were actively engaged in a boycott of everything Japanese. In the course of this movement, that class of house which represents the chief Japanese industry suffered from a considerable loss of custom, and such of the Chinese who continued to frequent them ran the risk of something which was more than peaceful picketing. The result was that the Japanese women in Ipoh petitioned their official, and he was easily convinced that the safety, peace, and welfare of the State were endangered when so ancient an industry as theirs was threatened. That conviction was increased to certainty when he discovered that in recognition of his activity the Chinese had conferred on him the title of 'Head Keeper of Japanese Pleasure Houses.'

Well, you will remember what followed. The Protector printed handbills in the Chinese language and proceeded to distribute them in person. A clerk in a Chinese shop who received one crumpled it up and threw it on the ground. In consequence of this, he was arrested and banishment proceedings were taken against him. But the result of them was not exactly what the authors anticipated. The accused man and his friends knew that the courts had been closed to them and that it was useless to look for justice in the State. They quite understand that within the State the Resident is a very great man, but they also understood that outside the State he was a very small one. The whole story was laid before a journalist, who, in his turn, laid it before the public, and took care that it lost nothing in the telling. The case went home, and a question was actually asked in the House of Commons.

It is clear, then, that the exercise of the arbitrary power of banishment by the officials, although they protest that without it the administration could not be carried on, is not without danger to the officials themselves; and obviously, it tends to bring the English administration of these States into contempt. But not every man selected for banishment is able to get a journalist to publish his story, or have questions asked about his case in the House of Commons. I understand that between 300 and 400 people, mostly Chinese, were banished last year, and the same number during the previous year. In a community numbering only one million persons of all ages, this represents a considerable proportion of subject to official displeasure, or able to pay blackmail. For these Acts which allow Government servants to deport without trial, also provide opportunities for blackmail, which, says Mr. Ives in his "History of Penal Methods," is never fully effective without the lever of the criminal law."

Mr. Ferrers says: 'Consider for a moment the case of the average Chinese coolie who may have given some cause of offence to some official in Trengganu or Kelantan for which he is promptly banished. Suppose such a man to have been resident in the country some ten years and to have married a wife and had a family. After he has been hurried off to China, the woman and children naturally return to her family either here or to Malacca. A year or two may elapse, and the man, if he is not totally dejected, might feel it worth while again to see if he can discover what has become of these for whom he knows he is responsible. He will not have returned very long before he will be recognised by a detective or a spy in the pay of the Chinese Protectorate. So long as he is prepared to pay for his freedom, he is allowed to live in peace; but the time arrives when the informer thinks that he can make a better profit by selling his victim to the Protectorate. After that the man has only to be identified for the Judicial Commissioner, and and stipulates that 'any person so prosecuted shall on conviction be sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for a term equal to that for which he was banished.' As most punishments are for life and for being "notoriously infamous," the Chinese coolie returning to any one of the nine Federated States, in ignorance of the fact that the banishment applies to all of them, is usually imprisoned for life. The very Act that should remove these disturbers of the 'safety, peace, and welfare' of the State, it is actually responsible for their perpetual detention within its borders; and Mr. Ferrers says: 'I cannot help thinking that recently the number of cases which have occurred of men being found in the State who have returned from banishment is beginning to cause the authorities some uneasiness.'

This uneasiness will probably be increased in the near future. The Chinese revolution was not only watched with interest by the Chinese population of the Malay States, but open sympathy was expressed with, and active assistance was given to, the revolutionists by many of them. Not only did they propagate the doctrines of the revolutionary party, and collect funds for their support; but bombs were made and sent to China, and it seems that some of the Chinese were actually engaged in raising troops to support the rebellion. Instead of arresting these persons and openly trying them, and thus informing the whole population what extent of liberty of action is allowed in support of an attempt to upset a form of government, they were taken. "Midnight arrests were made, persons were hurried out of the country without any cause being assigned, and matters reached such a pitch that no Chinese who was known to sympathise with the Reform Party could be certain that he was safe."
But the Revolution succeeded; and the Protector had to explain to those he had been threatening with pains and penalties that he was, of course, a supporter of the Reform movement himself. The result was that he discredited the Department with both factions. The supporters of the Manchus felt that they were betrayed, and the support of the reform movement was convinced that the professions of the Chinese Protectorate could not be relied on; and a furious faction fight began.

When order was restored, a Commission was appointed for the investigation of the cause of the disturbances. The rioting had been serious, and the ordinary business throughout the State had been suspended for three or four days. At least a score of murders had been committed, and the authors remained at large. But the Government would not disclose the failure of their favourite method, and the report of the Commission was never published. None the less, the official recognition of the Chinese Republic cannot be delayed much longer; and it will doubtless be followed by an attempt to return to the Malay States by a number of those who were banished for their activities in support of the Revolution.

What will the Government do then? Will it banish them again, or sentence them to rigorous imprisonment? The attempt to do either will obviously bring the whole matter before the English public; and if these Acts are not repealed before that time, they will certainly be repealed then. Even now it probably only requires the malicious banishment of some wealthy Chinese to raise a clamour which would not enhance the reputation of the English administration. The power of banishment without trial is a power that no Government of English derivation should possess; it substitutes the spy for the policeman, the informer for the witness, the bureaucrat for the judge, and it dispenses "justice" in accordance with the ethics of treachery. We have quarrel enough with the administration of justice as it is, but if public trial does not, it is certain that secret condemnation cannot, secure the legal liberty of any individual. The power conferred by these Banishment Acts puts a premium on every vice; it is itself a crime, and it begets crime. The spy is only less worthy than the person who accepts his information, the blackmailer is only a more detestable person than the one who maintains a power that makes blackmail possible; and when we find these persons flourishing side by side with Government officials who will neither give a civil nor an intelligent answer to a question concerning the life-long liberty of a human being, it is time to remember our English traditions, and insist on having the body before a duly constituted tribunal for public trial before subjecting it to punishment of any kind.

UNDER WHICH FLAG?

When I survey the wondrous mess Which Smuts and Botha made—
With "sixty thousand men"—(no less!)
To storm—the Hall of Trade!
And kidnap men in dead of night,
(Untried and on no charge!)
Excusing all with—"Might is Right!"
I gasp—"How fine—and large!"

Who knows how swiftly they may learn,
If angry with the Mines,
To kidnap—Magnates—in their turn,
Upon the self-same lines?
Or when—if pinched by tight finance,
They'll try a novel plank
And some fine night, with half a chance,
"Depot! The Standard Bank!"

Or this—maybe you'll be Hertog's gem,
When he comes on out on top:
To "think it best"—to deport Them!
For none could bid him stop:
Bridget—hard down to the Union Jack.
And furl the good flag Red—:
Then hoist your pirate-flag—jet Black! For "Law" and "Order"—"despot!"

First Glimpses of Egypt

By Richard Carle.

The utter insignificance of Alexandria from the sea is a true reflection of that disenchanting and sordid town. A mass of huddled houses, some palms along the beach, a ridge of sand—and that is all. Coming up out of the bright sparkle of the Mediterranean one gazes without enthusiasm upon the land of the Pharaohs. To set foot in Egypt for the first time may suggest some dramatic emotion—but the reality is extremely depressing. However, no one stops in Alexandria. Cairo lies 140 miles away, and everyone makes for the capital at once. It is a quick journey. The train runs through the delta lands of the Nile. Far on either side stretch green, level fields, divided everywhere by irrigation canals. Here work the Egyptian peasants, the fellaeen, with an untiring slowness, with an admirable and eternal industry. Along the paths from the railway station come carriage-loads of porters, of men on donkeys, of camels laden with alfafla, pass endlessly up and down. At the time of year I made the journey, that is to say, in the latter part of February, swallows were skimming over the sheets of water and green plover stood motionless by every glittering pool.

Of Cairo itself, it is difficult to know what to say. Its cosmopolitanism is at once interesting and disappointing. It resembles a great hive of parti-coloured bees, with its Egyptian water-sellers, its British officials, its English soldiers, American tourists, Indian fortune-tellers, Arab traders, Greek merchants, Coptic priests, Jewish usurers, German waiters, Assyrian gypsies, Armenian pedlars, French engineers, Italian restaurant keepers—a bewildering and confusing throng. It buzzes and hums, and is probably unrivalled. Situated far from the fashionable quarter of European hotels and broad highways, they are simply an immense warren of covered-in narrow lanes lined with open stalls. You find your way through a network of small streets that surround them like an outer shell, and up and down which pass laden donkeys and a crowd of men and of veiled women—the tumultuous and varied crowd of the East.

Slip through one of the long, dirty passages that open out at your elbow and you will find yourself in the semi-twilight of the bazaar. Its tentacles spread everywhere in an obscure labyrinth. There are abrupt corners, dark recesses, hidden roads leading you know not where. The path you are walking along is but a few feet in width. The stalls of the merchants, in which sit, cross-legged, the merchants themselves, are huddled on either side. Here are some that contain nothing but Turkish slippers of red and of yellow leather. There, farther on, is the stall of a scent seller faced by the stall of a saddler. Here, again, they sell blankets of camel wool, and, over there, embroideries from India and the Egyptian Delta. Turning a corner, you are amongst the brass merchants. Spiral particles of metal litter the way and hammering is going on incessantly. The stalls gleam with the shine of brass ornaments and dishes. Here, a little distance off, is a man selling cigarettes scented with ambergris. And here is an Arab boy is blowing the bellows. On the other side some men are pouting yellow cinnamon in huge mortars. Its spicy but rather sickly odour pervades the air. At this corner is a shop stocked with Turkish carpets, next to one full of antiques and illuminated Korans.

Then, turning into a fresh by-way, you will enter the jewellers' quarter. Here is a case full of turquoise, many of them still in the reticls. Its pleasant owner smiles ingratiatingly upon you and beckons you forward. Be firm, or in another moment he will have offered you a tiny cup of café à la Turc, and once you have accepted it you are an easy victim. If you should want to buy anything do not dream of paying what he asks—these things are matters for adjustment.

And, to and fro, in the congested paths move the sellers of beans and of cooling drinks. Their cries, harsh and sudden, resound above the talk of the bargainers, the incessant hammering, and the feeble prayers of blind men who pass by led by little boys or grabbing with their hands.

Just outside the bazaar boundaries is the El-azhar, the largest mosque in Cairo, and perhaps the most important obscenarian Moslem university in the world. It is an ancient and imposing building, its sumptuous courts crowded with devout students. They sit in little groups round their teachers, dotted over the ground, with their white turbans and squat appearance, that resemble mushrooms in a field. The sound of their voices reciting from the Koran soars upward in a deafening babel. In various side-mosques are the students of different races—Moors, Abyssinian and so forth. An odd sight groups round their teachers, dotted so oddly, with their men dancing, facing one another, in swaying groups, uttering singular noises, calling upon Allah and the Prophet. At night the whole fair is lit by a million lampas. In the tents religious men dance, facing one another, in swaying groups, uttering singular noises, calling upon the name of Allah. Their set or agonised faces look blanched beneath the gleam of lights. And there are crowds, robed, tottering, swells over the ground in a solid phalanx. In certain tents holy men are expounding the life of Mohammed, but in others the dancers are still dancing. They will not cease till they drop from fatigue or fall into convulsions. Some wear the tarbush (the Turkish fez), and are in others the dancers are still dancing. They will not give you a hint—it is not wise to stay too long.

In Cairo these rejoicings are on a scale suitable to the religious procession (a procession some miles in length) which sweeps out of the city to offer its praise to Allah and the Prophet. At night the whole fair is lit by a million lampas. In the tents religious men dance, facing one another, in swaying groups, uttering singular noises, calling upon the name of Allah. Their set or agonised faces look blanched beneath the gleam of lights. And there are crowds, robed, tottering, swells over the ground in a solid phalanx. In certain tents holy men are expounding the life of Mohammed, but in others the dancers are still dancing. They will not give you a hint—it is not wise to stay too long: the reek of these perspiring bodies is no trifle.

I do not intend to say a word about the Pyramids or the Sphinx, or on which there is nothing new to be written, but will suggest to anyone who is weary taking the tram thither for the tenth time that he would had the softness of a summer afternoon in England. Over the surface of the lake, and from tree to tree, and along the trellis-work at my feet great masses, of purple bouganvillaea were in full bloom. When I was there, at the end of February, I could sit out on my balcony after breakfast and listen to the croon of building doves. The sun shone warmly, and along the trelis-work at my feet are the green fields of its irrigation. Nothing could be a bad way. Here, at night time, prowl hyenas and jackals, and here, by day, come picnic parties from the hotels. For my own part I would rather explore the Moikatam hills, a silent, stony, and dreadful land, from which the Egyptians quarried a vast amount of stone for their pyramids, and which are riddled visibly with their excavations. But, on the whole, it is wise to keep within the shade of the town during the burning hours. There, at any rate, you can find rest for the eye and protection for the head.

In the early morning I used to lie awake whilst a delicious freshness blew into my room from the cooled desert. It is good to rise while the rosy light is still widening in the sky, for soon the sand will reflect the sun’s rays with fierce intensity. It is only in the first and last hours of the day that there is a touch of coolness. When I was there, at the end of February, I could sit out on my balcony after breakfast and listen to the croon of building doves. The sun shone warmly, and along the trelis-work at my feet great masses of purple bouganvillaea were in full bloom.

In the late afternoon people walk out over the desert in the direction of the Nile. Across the river the pyramids of Sakkarah stand up sharply, and far on the right you can see the greater pyramids of Ghizeh. The track of the Nile itself is marked by a thread of silver and by the green fields of its irrigation. Nothing could be stranger than the way you pass suddenly from arid waste to the highest fertility. In one moment, as it were, you have come out of bleak sand into active life.

In every direction artificial waterways intersect the land. Men are working busily in the fields, animals are cropping the grass. The roads are alive with traffic; the valley of the Nile supports an unsuspected population. Near by, amongst a clump of date palms, stands an Arab village, and that he has the appearance it is typical of any Arab village of the Mahomedan world. At this hour of the evening almost every living creature in sight is slowly converging upon it—men and women and children, donkeys, sheep, goats, cows, buffaloes, and camels. They stream in aimless but artistic disorder over the flat landscape, along the borders of the canals, through the fields, and down the roads.

Just here the cultivated land, on this shore does not seem to be more than a mile in width. By walking forward you will arrive presently at the Nile itself. It flows quietly, the old, famous river, rather broader than the Thames at Chelsea, and unimpressive looking at this floodless season. Upon its surface feluccas with their lateen sails set are moving up and down stream. The muddy water ripples leisurely beneath the evening breeze. Apart from association, there is little of romance in the scene. There is, indeed, a feeling of desolation that is positively dispiriting. Someone has been so enterprising as to add a restaurant here on the very bank of the river, where you can have afternoon tea and, on moonlight nights, dinner into the bargain. But you had better be turning back if you want to reach Helouan again before it is dark. For the twilight light falls awatn after the midsummer suns of the North. Even now, there is a perceptible change, a change like the pelucid afterglow of sunset. Frogs are beginning to croak in the canals—after dark here you might imagine yourself in Southern Italy.
roads are growing deserted, the village has received back its children for the night. Now, looking across the desert, you may observe a long string of small flakes, at right angles to your line of vision. It is a Bedouin cavalcade setting forth by night for distant Suez. And at your back, beyond the pyramids of Sakkara, beyond Bedreshein and all that remains of ancient Memphis, the desert glare of red rock is fading out of the sky. The sunset of the desert will soon be over: you will observe a long string of camels crawling, their heads down, their bodies drooping in the heat of the evening.

The Holy Trinity.

By Will Lowes.

After attending a Socialist Unity meeting promoted by the I.L.P., the B.S.P., and the Fabian Society I was left in somewhat the same state of bewilderment as I was after hearing the Holy Trinity "explained" by a Methodist local preacher. As a Guild Socialist, of course I did not enter into the scheme of things at the meeting. However, it was marvellously interesting to a New Age reader. Our friends the Syndicalists were mentioned frequently, but only as a sort of afterthought, much in the same way as a man with plumage might mention a boil on his neck. Possibly Mrs. Webb saved time and breath by including us Guilders with the Syndicalists. The Unity on the platform was composed of Keir Hardie, H. M. Hyndman, and Mrs. Sidney Webb.

Well, Hyndman had nothing new to tell us and has at least the saving grace of being something like consistent. Social democracy—political social democracy—is the way of salvation. Socialism is inevitable. Also the wage-system must go. This last sounded all right; but, alas, no mention of monopolising labour and refusing to take part in wages. Capture the political machine is still the burden of his song. And the wage-system must go—on. The Labour movement's failure in politics he appears to account for by the fact that the Labour Party is not composed of Social Democrats.

Mrs. Webb modestly told us that the Fabian Society was "a sort of sub-committee of the Socialist movement, writing pamphlets and gathering statistics." Appearing to forget that she was at an exhibition of Socialist Unity, she at once informed Mr. Hyndman that he was too hard on the Labour Party. They truly represented working-class opinion, and besides, they were not even Socialists, those members of the Labour Party. Evidently the pamphlet writing business has been a failure. It must be, for she again disagreed with Hyndman and said Socialism was not inevitable—despite the work of the Fabians. Another for unity. Friend Bellow will doubtless be delighted to hear that Mrs. Webb endorses his view that if we are not careful we will have the Servile State upon us. Really now, how can we think that the Fabians are doing their best to justify Mr. Bellow's fears? Mrs. Webb holds original views on "rebels" and those "who call themselves Syndicalists." (We might come in with this little lot, in her opinion.) She thinks the rebels have only succeeded in waking the Capitalist up. But the bother is they have woke him up too soon. It must be annoying. Just picture, as I did, Mrs. Webb and her Fabian revolutionists creeping into the bedroom of Mr. Will Dyson's Fat Man; Mrs. Webb is armed with a nice new political dagger and behind her, Sidney. In case of emergency and the internal revolver—just for fear, you know! All is ready for the execution of the terrible fat man. He snores placidly and is quite unaware of the Ganger almost upon him. Suddenly, the whole show is spoiled by a devil of a row outside—the Syndicalists have come! Of course no one can be decently murdered and buried in a row like that, so Fatty wakes up and the Revolution is postponed once more. Have you never thought of the intricate plots you rebels may have spoiled by your plundering? Small wonder Ramsay is annoyed. I wonder if we are included in those who have spoiled the finale of the Socialist Revolution?

Keir Hardie was left until the last. He startled his followers out of their wits by saying that every day he saw more and more the dangers of nationalisation. In France it did not save the railway workers and in South Africa it had similarly failed to benefit the workers. Now statements like that before the L.L.P.s were not calculated to make for Socialist unity, so there was an audible sigh of relief when such thorny ground was left. Hardie managed to get a word or two in about the proposed scheme of Socialist unity. There is to be no fusion; none of the three organisations will lose any individuality; and a council is to be formed to agree upon as much joint effort as possible in the "face of the enemy." The Unity is therefore quite clear to each organisation, but to no one else. And each one has a different idea as to what they can agree about.

The whole meeting was a confession of futility, and now they propose unity amongst organisations admittedly futile. Not a doubt was ever expressed as to the wisdom of putting political action first. They cry "Peace," when there is no peace.

Towards the Play Way.

The Revival of the Arts.

It is a matter of amazement to me that the lively circle of readers who more or less support The New Age should have allowed Mr. Arthur J. Penty's contribution "Art as a Factor in Social Reform," to pass comparatively unnoticed. True, we have had the complaint of Mr. E. M. Mitchell that he has been thrown into deep water where he cannot swim, and the comforting assurance of Mr. Frank J. Merry that religious traditions are springing up all around us, e.g., "Christian Science, the Higher Thought, the Baha Movement, not to speak of numerous "occult" sciences in existence." But the sole comment of any real interest is the note from the Guild Writers to say that they find themselves much in agreement with Mr. Penty. There is no doubt that many of us have long hoped for some contributory thesis which should express those spiritual and aesthetic ideas which must necessarily inform the economic system known to us all as the National Guilds. It will be remembered that Mr. E. M. Caldwell Cook started a hars. Someone lamed it with the nickname "psychological factor"; and such were Mr. Cowley's methods of discussion, and the Roman Catholic predisposition of his mind, that the whole subject was too soon hedged with leetices and vituperation. Finally, Mr. Cowley lost his temper and, as so many do, performed a wasp-like suicide in the correspondence column. But do not the readers of The New Age consider themselves a body of men and women who, understanding each other's intentions in the main, have met together to discuss what may be called a fit way of life; to hear ideals, "talk with respect and swear but now and then," to examine opinions, and criticise practical suggestions? If so, we must take a share in the duty of everyone to make what contribution he can from his own wisdom and experience. And so, if after a decent pause I now venture to say what I suppose could have been said by anyone else, that is his fault and not mine.

"This fellow makes a great beating of the bush."

"Yes, but the bush is a burning one, and you have to be sure the way is clear of angels before you rush in."

Mr. Penty begins by insisting on the common origin of the economic problem and the aesthetic problem in society it will need to be organic with society. That is to say, that art, if it is to exist at all in any real sense must be part and parcel of the life all men hold in common.

To make art less and less the prepossession of the individual and more the possession of the community is the life-work I have set myself. So that, in taking up Mr. Penty's question, I am most happy to have my preface as preamble, and to be right at the heart of my subject.

The problem, of course, is not how to secure "pictures for the people," or "music for the million," but in the words of Mr. Penty, "How to reconstruct society so that the artist will more become organic with it, instead of being parasitic upon it, as he is to-day. How to reconstruct or unify the technical tradition of art, or language of design, so that a medium of expression understood by all shall be common property of the artist and the people. And how to provide the art with such beliefs and traditions as provide the subject matter for the higher forms of art. These are then practically three problems to be solved before any great art can rise again, and of these (the second) is primarily the concern of the artist, and its solution is largely dependent upon the solution of the other two."

Now let the reader again glance over these three separate aspects of the problem. If the second is primarily the concern of the artist, the first is certainly the concern of the sociologist; and the third, most difficult, as surely the concern of teachers. Accordingly I take up the discussion of the last point first, and examine it in the light of the Play Way.

Mr. Edmund Holmes in his educational essay "What Is and What Might Be" makes, if I remember rightly, a severe criticism of obedience to authority as a guiding principle in life as contrasted with reliance upon one's own ideal conception. The word "religion," closely connected with the word "rely," and religious faith is always said to give an ever-present sense of being guided, a sense of having some touchstone by which to distinguish the good from the bad. When it is not a matter of taste!, a sense of being supported in pursuance of the one and delivered from the temptation of the other. What we are to believe in, what faith we are to hold, is of course the one subject of the deepest speculation, and yet it is closely connected with the word "rely," and religious faith is always said to give an ever-present sense of being guided, a sense of having some touchstone by which to distinguish the good from the bad.

Is and What Might Be" makes, if I remember rightly, a severe criticism of obedience to authority as a guiding principle in life as contrasted with reliance upon one's own ideal conception. The word "religion," closely connected with the word "rely," and religious faith is always said to give an ever-present sense of being guided, a sense of having some touchstone by which to distinguish the good from the bad.

So that, though I do not make the absurd claim of preaching a definite faith, of dispensing religion in tabloid form, yet I do think that any man may preach worship; that, is a recognition of the things of value and the value of things, and a living in accord with this recognition. Worship is the active recognition of worthiness. The commonplace that worship is not merely the acknowledgment of good, but the practice of it, enables me to make my point clear. It is that this statement is equally true, and in my opinion far more true, when read the other way on: Only through the practice of anything can come a full acknowledgment of its worth. This, being such a definite statement, implies a host of qualifications, but I must be allowed to hold them in suspension for a while.

Accordingly, if it be asked: "How shall we revive a feeling for art values in the minds of the people? I suggest in reply: "Open up again the practice of the art, and the stream of poetry will flow again through your handiwork, and give it life."

"Lift up your heads, O zè gates; Yea, lift them up, ye everlasting doors; And the King of glory shall come in."

Who is this King of glory? The Lord of hosts. He is the King of glory.

When I wish to help little boys to see the mighty and beauty of poetry I do not discourse upon poetics, but start the whole miracle with the one word "Make." You must fall straight away upon the actual work, and you will find out what you are doing as you go along; more and more you feel what you ought to do, and now and then if you are lucky you manage to do it. And all the time, of course, you have a sympathy and understanding with the art-doings of others, whether those others be the past-masters of your craft or your fellow-pren- tices.

To do a thing first in the hope of finding out later on how, and eventually why, may appear at first a queer suggestion, as though one should deliberately put the cart before the horse. But, short of visions and divine revelations, how else may we ask, are we to acquire an impulse to work? Of course it is not denied that a great artist is often started with an idea which works out into some expressive form. But even in his case consider the manifold additions that accrue to him as he goes along, the miraculous gifts latent in the nature of tool and material, the fullness of inspiration that comes only in the hour of doing. I may instance in passing, the conventions of the Elizabethan theatre which served as it were the office of a mould to shape many of the fine creations of Shakespeare. Or call them paths down which he ran and rivers he had to bridge. If good plays are to be made they must be wrought on an existing stage convention and wrought fit, not written out of a man's head. It is the same with the arts, they must cease to be airy nothing and get them a local habitation. So long as we sit and ask why someone doesn't get up and do something, nothing will happen; but as soon as we rise and fall to, then it will all be happening as before. The gods help those that help themselves. If the Devil finds work for idle hands, which I doubt not, it is equally certain that God himself directs the busy. What right has anyone to speak of faith, who does not admit that there is some higher aid to be hoped for than lies in his own creation efforts? The wise artist is like a young mother trimming a cradle and sewing tiny garments against the happening of a creative wonder. Build you a fair nest overnight and you may wake to find a bird in it.

It is my expectation, then, that the beliefs and traditions spoken of by Mr. Penty, which now seem all do dead, will be restored among us when we observe again the forms and ceremonies in which they reside. Do we await the inspiration of a god? No; a visitation of wrath seems possible to day. Let us build a lane, and therein over the consecrated altar shall the unknown be declared. The sun shines all over the earth, but no flowers grow on the cinder-heaps, which is kept arid by the daily piling up of ashes. Where in these days seems past lifting? While temple there is none, it presses on us all with its heart-ache. The ugly, the squalid is imposed upon and not willingly endured by the people. Then why not remove it?

WHEREVER one may go in London, the question is, "Is there anything new?" Probably Solomon asked this question; and probably once, at least, some courtier pointed to the theatrical and sordid and said, with the truth: "O King, nothing new can arise; there is no room here for spirit." New things come from thinkers; and we have only novelty, which is never new; in London is the room for that mental work of thought to make gifts. The overwhelming ugliness of London seems past lifting; it presses on us all with its heart-sickening, constant tapping and disintegration. And this ugliness is not that of poverty; poverty is, at most, a negative cause; the ugliness is that of misapplied wealth. The rich build the cheap barracks, the tramways, the lavatories in the middle of the street—for the better regimentation of the poor; the rich are responsible for all the distorting and distracting symbols of pretence, from cinematographs, from school boards to workmen's barracks, from cheap churches to gin palaces. With a thousand artists devoted their hearts in idle bitterness, the people of London live amid squalor so immense and wide-pervading—but is it deep? It is not deep! Squalor has not yet reached the heart of the people. All the offence to eye and ear has not yet killed spirit. The squalor is imposed upon and not wilfully endured by the people. Then why not remove it? If the tension is continued until the inner troubles are settled; this uglification of the city is in the interest of the rich against the poor.

Artists! can you not see your enemy? Poets! do you not realise why, though you plan with such enthusiasm, your inspiration dies before you may form it?

Your enemies are the vulgar rich of to-day, the miserly, insolent and murderous plutocracy. Attack, then, this plutocracy!

You have played with it. You have allowed it to subsidise you. What—subsidise? You are all within the menace of in-security. Some of you eat well, you dress well—till the last of the aristocrats and the last of the commoners. What of even a year hence? The subsidy is not of your art, but of your tricks. How long will your patrons be amused by these tricks? These patrons regard you as so many performing monkeys. Do not doubt it—but you do not know yet—"nothing will keep them interested, but the practice of art leaves you unrewarded. And when you protest at neglect, you see that the Government endows some trickster, and your voice is cunningly silenced. It is not endowment that you want, but encouragement of your own gift by a leisureed and a free public. Only at the cost of mutual rivalry in sensationalism, and not in art, one, here and there, among you wins a temporary approval and a disdained and niggardly patronage.

But what do you want with the approval and patronage of the idle, the cunning, the careless, the ignorant? You know that your patrons are ignorant. You despise them. You know what you say among yourselves. You know that it is to come to this—that you must guard these despicable patrons even from acquaintance with other artists, even from knowledge that a watch over the fool he means to deceive. Why? Because your patron is so ignorant that he may as well be in another's hands as in yours for all his wit will serve him because he has no notion of worth and talent, but will pay:—not so much as a victoria, the price of a night's debauch—to be the amused and—make no mistake—contemptuous buyer of your antics. He is contemptuous because he is ignorant. Though you may hand him a masterpiece or a foilspiece, you will never seem more to him than an incomprehensible but amusing ape!

Attack these would-be patrons! They throw you the change of the gold they wring from the working class. You could not live on it, though it were borrowed one million times as much as the wretched pieces you get! There is no life to be had through this money—no life that will satisfy the spirit of a soul gifted with invisible, eternal and watching gods. Destroy your enemies! Do not—do not think of the workers as of slaves! There is no slave-class in England. There is no aristocracy in England. The powerful class is the monied class; and this class injures all—poets, musicians, painters, architects, equally with the craftsmen and menial labour. Attack this class, this sordid and contemptuous plutocracy! Nothing can arise from your spirits while the incubus of this class is allowed to feed upon the nation's energy.

"Regard your works as your fortune. Are you satisfied with them? You are not! You know there is less art than trick in them all. How can you bear to be so stultified by the sentimental and foolery-inviting upper mob? Break away! Live! Do! Be no more the refuge of a class that you hate, that you hate justly—for like the sighing squire, it sighs for more prey, for the prey it has not! You feed its sighs—and truly, you laugh while you feed it away. What are you doing? You are feeding it with your own life! While these monied upstarts, galvanised by you, practise aesthetic folly, you yourselves are bidden live, act and speak like the conventional bourgeoisie. Temperament, that is a reality among artists, is sneered at as either a pose or a drunken effect. Liveliness, that is life-likeness, naturalness, must be suppressed—there is a near limit to what your patrons will consider offensive in you.

The judgment may come from your minds, or at the hands of the wreathed of wretched, the starved—the starved in human body (as you are starved in spirit). You despise them; You know there is less art than trick in them all. How can you bear to be so stultified by the sentimental and foolery-inviting upper mob? Break away! Live! Do! Be no more the refuge of a class that you hate, that you hate justly—for like the sighing squire, it sighs for more prey, for the prey it has not! The judgment may come from your minds, or at the hands of the wreathed of wretched, the starved—the starved in human body (as you are starved in spirit). See that your judgment come quickly! Pour out your true sentiments. The day of persuasion is passing and all but past—almost too far spent for hope that reason may prevail against the vilest inclination in powerful men, namely, the will to disable and destroy their kind.
A DANCER. BY GAUDIER-BRZESKA.
Readers and Writers.

The writer of the "Anglo-Oriental Notes" in The New Age for February 12 presented a number of his contemporaries with no more than their deserts, but in one instance he passed sentence rather hastily. I appeal on behalf of the defendant who, described as a "new German poetaster," is charged with feloniously "contemplating his navel—a naked ruby in a shining belly of gold." The fact is that this "new German poetaster" is none other than Herr Arno Holz, who celebrated his fiftieth birthday last April. He is there-

By their hysterical eulogies of Tagore, the German critics show how easily the remote and exotic can gratify them. Yet, as I have previously indicated in these notes, they remain almost completely indifferent to the whole body of modern Slavonic literature, with the exception of the Russian. It is true that the publishing house of Otto in Prague issues a "Slavische Romanbibliothek," whose object is to present the best Slavonic fiction to German readers; but I have never found many of the volumes on sale in German shops, and I can only conclude that they are used by the Slavs themselves for purely linguistic purposes. The woes of Herr Eugen Diederichs, the publisher of Die Blume, issued in German translation, a four-volumed Polish novel, are recent. I have already tried to sell it, I have already recounted. It is therefore interesting to note that a selection from the poetical works of Brezina has recently appeared in German: "Ottoak Brezin's "Der jungstige Tag. Neue Dichtungen," being the twelfth volume of a series called, "Der jüngste Tag. Neue Dichtungen." Considering that, even under the best conditions, the sale cannot be very wide, the price of the book (80 pf.) is quite reasonable.

A few weeks ago, "Das Neue Wiener Journal" contained a thoughtful article by Dr. Eduard Engel, entitled, "Anumus Blunders in Translation." With Dr. Engel's opinions on bilingualism I am not altogether in agreement. But that is a big subject, which need not concern us now. Many of Dr. Engel's examples of blunders in translation are new to me, and one or two of them are well worth mentioning here. I notice, by the way, that the curious case of Mr. Trebitsch, to which I have already bowed my head in mute but shaking wonderment, receive their due measure of credit from Dr. Engel also. It seems, too, that plenty of amusement can be derived from a version of Schiller's "Rohrr," prepared by the elder Dumas. But the palm should surely be yielded to a German newspaper for reporting a theatrical performance in Constantinople, at which the Sultan had been present "in his bath-tub," which contains Multatuli's exposure of official corruption in Java, should be republished.

Tagore with his Nobel prize has caused quite a splash—or rather series of splashes—in Germany. All sorts and conditions of writers have been pummeling up strange things they call "thee" or "thou" and the poor Indian whose untutored mind sees salvation in the printing presses of the Macmillans. But the only
The Fabian Fantasia.
(From an Unpublished Novel.)

By Beatrice Hastings.

DOUBTFULS I was very willing to awake to the needs of my nation since with such a responsive heart I prepared to follow the Fabians towards Social Reform... There were light, fiery and airy spirits, also very loquacious, gleaming if not exactly blazing, among the members. The Social Day was going to be carried by laughing tolerance. Society was bound to be brought in, because it could not do anything shocking enough to exclude it from reformation. We all smiled. The most apparently bitter and inflammatory discussions broke off with engagements to resume at the earliest moment. Things had got to be thrashed out.

Efficiency, the young band played ecstatically. From the Law, the body of the hall, far back, and in the gallery, platform of notables inked over sheets about the Poor, and men audibly wished they might never come down. Mea professed to classic vices for escape from spinsters wistfully donning gymnastic costumes. Lights were forbidden after eleven o'clock; and healthful slumber on hayricks was practised as a duty by all but chimney-sweeps. Applauding a diet of mounds of nuts and cooking raisins and lakes of peasoup, people discovered each other paying secret scores at the village Inn. I wore a well-cut skirt and played croquet, because one must walk when old with skipping, and abjured the lectures and was abjured by the notables who knew that I was of the rebel camp and no croquet-player.

And Snobbery was Queen. Remember that all this is strictly true, much truer than any pen might describe. To get even near the whole grotesque truth one would need to thrust away from oneself the charitable influence of standard English and invoke the diabolical aid of asterisks. Parody would be comparatively charitable, if parody were possible. I will try.

One afternoon I was wearied of knocking croquet balls to the tune of someone's genealogy of the Great. I determined to seem Somebody, too; so I brought along my Four Fat Aunts from the village. The one who was marked "niece of Twenty Thousand Pounds" knocked over two tea-tables. Nobody minded! We were all rich together—and socially prominent! Two incomes above three hundred picked up the things, and one of five hundred brushed a crumb from my Aunt's feather boa, and men audibly wished they might have trotted so fast. In the middle of the night I was awakened by the voices of some Apes of Us. "Ermyntrude, do you mind? Some fellows have come for tea and cheese!" "'No! A-awdorable! Come in! I'll dash a gown on!" Across the passage a light flared where a third Ape, a drizzly-looking darling, was soothing the aches of Us. "Ermytrude, do you mind? Some fellows have come for tea and cheese!" "'No! A-awdorable! Come in! I'll dash a gown on!" Across the passage a light flared where a third Ape, a drizzly-looking darling, was soothing the aches of Us. "Ermytrude, do you mind? Some fellows have come for tea and cheese!" "'No! A-awdorable! Come in! I'll dash a gown on!"

And now fell in a period of war extraordinary. Against a background of gloomy, watchful, icy Efficiency, the young band played ecstatically. From island-planning to endowment of everybody, the whole world was settled up with due and perfect accretions and eliminations. The Fabian Society was to be captured, the rebel stronghold manned with broadly tolerant spirits. But the lead of those who had been howled down was already away from the Fabian Society, no rebel stronghold, indeed, but a bureaucratically officious in communication with Lib-Labery.

Some business called me away from the uproarious coffee-parties where we ached with revolution and laughter; and when I next went among Fabians it was in a place where the notables were ruled by bribed and flattered accounting Efficient, and rebellion among these had sunk to unconventional tricks.

I found the real fantastic Fabian Society. Remember that rigid background and yet believe that every word of the following is strictly true.

People bathed like Adam and Eve; and wives dogged their husbands' footsteps. Girls scaled mountains to gain desirability; and men audibly wished they might never come down. Mea professed to classic vices for escape from spinsters wistfully donning gymnastic costumes. Lights were forbidden after eleven o'clock; and healthful slumber on hayricks was practised as a duty by all but chimney-sweeps. Two incomes above three hundred picked up the things, and one of five hundred brushed a crumb from my Aunt's feather boa, which later mysteriously disappeared. A thin notable escorted us to the very threshold, and I really feared she meant to embrace my Aunts, when all would have been discovered. I was fervently gratified at this proof of having become acceptable, for only the night before the thin notable had savagely left me to find my way through unknown and densely black woods while she went off in illuminated triumph with the only lantern. You had never believed that an elderly dodderer might have trotted so fast. In the middle of the night I was awakened by the voices of some Apes of Us. "Ermytrude, do you mind? They all compromised themselves dramatically by lending these things, and made the open and making sure that the whole world knew they were having a midnight tea-party. And next day, the world said they had behaved shockingly, and it didn't know what Mrs. Webb would say. But they were all at least three hundred pounders, and, of course, if you're the right sort of people it doesn't matter what you do. Back in London, I found the rebels resigning. Autumn saw the last one out of the Fabian Society. A new idea was beginning to breathe—that which the Notables had vainly tried to strangle. Men were talking of National Guilds.
Only an H.P.:
A Materialistic Study.
By T. O. R.

The House Physician stretched himself and growled. When in time would Croton be back? Dinner had come and gone; he had eaten three pancakes, burnt out half a dozen cigarettes, and sipped through two cups of weakest Mocha—and yet, no Croton had arrived! There could be no billiards that night. Stupid luck! What would life be at Marnham without billiards?

Suddenly a notion pricked him. Reaching over the side of his low arm-chair, and straining a little uncomfortably, he switched off the electric lights. Two large yellow lights, the grateful patient faces, the burning, hopeless,odynamics, the whole damned sanatorium could go to hell!

Life in a sanatorium!—the hyper-optimistic personalities, the grateful patient faces, the burning, hopeless, hopeless eyes-fighting the good fight with all their might. God! how horrible it all seemed! And yet—and yet—the Great White Beast was on the run! Sick and sore unto death though the knights-errant may be, the Great White Beast was on the run—at last! Pif! Too sentimental! Must be those confounded "Russians." Should not smoke so much! Up went the yellow lights; up jumped the lonely H.P. and started to whistle boisterously. The piano found his eye, and in a moment the room trembled to the latest rag-time melodies. Scottish, not, superior reader! Remember he was only an H.P.

When the Orange Devil of Sentimentality had been strummed out our H.P. flopped down to read. 'Twas a book of short stories by one Amelia Stunt, and but lately published. Croton had praised it. Psychol-...
A Lost Leader.
By Vance Palmer.

It was late in the afternoon when we were put ashore, and after herding for three days in a dark hold with a horde of Manchu coolies there was something stimulating in the feel of land beneath the feet. The town was nothing more than a huddle of flimsy houses, bounded on the front by the harbour and in the rear by a cone-shaped hill covered with red maples, but in the soft sunlight it looked surprisingly clean, as if everything had been washed by recent rains. The outlines of the buildings, and of the hills, were sharply defined, and the sense of buoyancy, though one’s eye sight had cleared. Stumbling up from the landing-stage with my portmanteau I was surrounded by a crowd of Japanese boys, who clustered about my heels air ing their few words of Russian, and offering to act as porters for a couple of sen.

That, however, only served as a reminder of my penniless state. Other anxieties had crowded it from my mind for a while, but now it was disquieting to remember that I had not even enough to pay for a night’s lodging. The train fare across to the eastern seaboard was money waiting at Yokohama, the fact would carry no member that I had not even enough to pay for a night’s lodging. I wandered among the narrow back streets overfed. The lines of his head showed that a noble stomach, and his naked feet were thrust into straw sandals. Nevertheless he had the air of being a man of property, for his explosive eyes looked out challengingly upon the world, and the half-open door of his shop revealed coils of rope, barrels of tar, boxes of soap, and a number of his ship’s chandler.

It seemed incredible that he should have employment to offer, but there was, at least, no harm in giving him the chance. He looked me up and down and then grunted, whether in assent or depreciation I found it hard to decide. He knew little English, and less German, but he had the capacity for talking fluently with his thick hands, and in a few minutes I gathered that he would be glad to have me come in the morning.

The days passed pleasantly enough, for few ships came in, and even then it meant nothing but an exciting race out to meet them between my boatman and two others. The gibes that were flung at me by other runners fell on deaf ears, though it needed no knowledge of his nationality than his personal prowess, so we invariably arrived last; but orders did not always fall to my share. By the day’s work I was right, and moreover his English had improved with the morning. It seemed that his Japanese runner had left him suddenly, and he could not remain without someone to row out to the incoming boats and impress the quality of his shops upon the officers. As the majority of the boats were English the knowledge of that language was a considerable asset, and besides one white man could make another realise the necessity of dealing with him rather than with a native. He looked at me suddenly with his strange, incandescent eyes, and for the first time I was made aware that I was in the presence of, not a mere ship’s chandler, but a personality.

It was surprising how vividly the impression came. His conception of himself seemed, for the moment, to be thrust forward aggressively till it became more manifest than that which the early years had implanted. I wondered at the look on his face, for the expression brought to his eyes as if the power of vision had cleared. Stumbling up from the landing-stage with my portmanteau I was surrounded by a crowd of Japanese boys, who clustered about my heels air ing their few words of Russian, and offering to act as porters for a couple of sen.

But when the store had closed for the day, Sasanov showed his approval of my increased business by inviting me to sup with him in his room at the back. His reticence had been broken down, and it needed no vodka to stimulate him to stories of the wonderful exploits in which he had taken part in his youth. He talked on this subject, gesticulating with his hands, and enjoying his memories as much as his food. For one memorable year, perhaps two, his mind seemed to have recorded impressions deeply and vividly, and the ex-haunted its receptivity. He was like an athlete whose wrist, extended by violent exertion, can never regain their plasticity, he grip on reality feebly; but he was aware of it; and there were still

I begin to understand why the Jews crucified Christ; the incurable irrelevancy of the advocacy of peace is an irritation not to be endured. It is not merely the fact its advocates, of Novikov and Mr. Norman Angell par-such an operation, which is typical of most international trade, be described as the competition of rival units—Great Britain, Germany, France, Brazil, or Russia?" The irrelevancy of the example and the question to the real ideal process of exchange, and no one has ever supposed that exchange was competition. Mr. Norman Angell has only side-tracked the real problem.

"Riches and Poverty"

'Fields, Factories, and Workshops.'
A Stone Ginger.

By Walter Sickert.

Not only are words not the painter's medium, but the very nature of his medium, and of the kind of life, and of the kind of precociousness that 'his medium imposes on him, renders him, of all men, the least apt at expression in words. Cumulative and silent observation, what the Germans call ablauschen, a manner of breathless listening, as it were, with the eyes, a listening extending over a long series of years, makes of him, so far as he is a painter, rather a silent than a resonant being. The game he pursues must not be startled, must even, as it were, be kept unaware of his presence. Insomuch as he is a painter he tends to be the opposite of "the observed of all observers." He has rather to be the "observer of all the observed." "Don't speak," is what he generally says or wishes to say. "Do not disturb the spell." A stillness like the sleeping game he pursues must not be startled, must even, as it were, be kept unaware of his presence. The beautiful common Venetian morning without thinking of that picture by Schwind, and Schwind wasn't labelled an anything-ist, but just a painter. His work required no treatise, and no absurdly reasoned justifications. I once had the folly, in speaking to Monsieur Degas, to use the expression "a genius" of a painter of our acquaintance. "Ce n'est pas un genie," he said, "c'est un peintre."

Or take the afternoon. The torpor of digestion are over. Tea has clarified the brain, and set tongues wagging again. The afternoon light through the open folding doors, from the small back-room in the classic uniform English first floor, into the bigger front room. The beautiful common Venetian blinds are down in the front room. The sympathetic personality of the man who is standing talking, saying almost anything, some of those things that we willingly listen to, just because they are not important, and so do not stir, but amuse us, has become transfigured by the light. The light has carved him like a gem. He happens to have the air of good-breeding, and wears a well-cut suit, as different from what the French call a suit "de chez de bon faiseur," as possible. For the moment his mood, his pose and the lighting conspire to make of his image the quintessence of a man's life. He is not so much Tom Smith as he is Everyman in No-man's-land. He is the painter's America, his new-found land. These things being things of the spirit, phantom sensations built of dust and sunbeams, of personal sympathy and a light play of mood, can we approach to an analysis of the instrument with which they shall be concentrated by the painter into a permanent record?

If he be only a painter, and not a draughtsman, he will be able to give you something, something beautiful, something with a certain charm of execution and colour, something to which will even cling a faint scent of the magic moment, but it will be a faint sensation only, to which he will give a degree of permanence. The work will be wanting in bite, in bulk, in depth, in resonance, and in uniqueness. But if the painter is doubled with the draughtsman, we get the supreme work. The model may be equestrian, but the work is, oh, so particular, so the reverse of quelconque. By a strange rule it would seem that the greater the painter the more indifferent may the model be. Does not a lover of genius search high and low for the plainest mistress he can find?

What is it, Hulme and Bergson, and all incomprehensible bedevilments and obluscations and convolutions and Regerisms apart, that happens in the few minutes when the painter and his muse have "the time of..." Mr. Epstein?

What I have written up to now have been some remarks on the painter's head by nature and occupation inapt for words. It is difficult and—who knows?—impious to lift the veil of creation. There is a modern tendency to be incessantly fumbling with the fig-leaf. The word "pudor" or our art-nuts would like to see erased from the dictionary. Shall I tell you why it is impious to lift the veil, and why the word "pudor" will never be erased? Because the result would be as dull— as will be the rest of this article, which should only be read by painters and art-students.

The man, then, whom I have left standing with a cheroot in one hand, looking out towards the light with his head slightly raised, half in pleasure at the sunshine, and half in a certain inspiration he gets from the shine, and half in a certain inspiration he gets from the theosophy, to which, in large measure, may be attributed its eccentricities. Yesterday was the third time I have heard the work, and I was never more impressed by its emptiness, impotence, and tawdriness. As to the scheme itself, it is evidently designed on a realistic basis. At the opening of "Prometheus" the composer illustrates primordial chaos, and he does this by sounds which certainly suggest that uncomfortable period.

In this age, when there is such a desire for new sensations and nerve stimulants, Mr. Scriabine's conglomeration of choral monstrosities may meet the need of a few. When all is said and done they only represent in sound the efforts of the Futurists in painting, the eccentricities of costume and the diseased imagination of certain novelists and playwrights. In the cause of sanity it should be added that fine performances of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and the overture to "Die Meistersinger,"... and so on. Now, if I were to ask Mr. "Lancelot," who indicted this illuminating screech, what he meant by "realistic basis," he would look very foolish in making reply. He simply used the word because it looks well and saves him the bother of describing a thing which is evidently beyond his intellectual grip. If I were to ask him how he had arrived at the conclusion that this elaborate and difficult work is empty and impotent and tawdry, he would again have to answer a question that would tax his brain beyond its power of reasoning. By no known process of deduction could any human being have arrived at the conclusion Mr. "Lancelot" has arrived at; he simply states the conclusion blandly and skims any discussion. It is so much easier.

If I were to ask the same erudite author what exactly he means by "realistic basis," he could give me a fair definition of those words, but he could show in what way this work is realistic. He couldn't for the life of him. "Realistic basis" is a phrase he uses because the work has a "programme," and it passes muster very well with most drowsy people on a Sunday after lunch. To those who know the music well, realism of the kind Mr. "Lancelot" is thinking about is entirely foreign to the Russian composer's work. It is not only foreign to it, it is in active opposition to it. Mr. "Lancelot" has not yet discovered this. Up against a problem like Scriabine's "Prometheus," he takes his cue from the few people who hissed; if they hadn't hissed and Mr. Scriabine had been banquetted before the concert by the committees of the Classical Concert Society and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, he would have found his job a little more difficult. I feel certain he would have sought refuge in the frequent use of the word "psychological." Hear him in discussing the interesting recital given in the Exilian Hall by the other evening of Mr. Franz Liebich. "Examples of Hungarian music were taken from the works of Messrs. Béla Bartók and Zoltán Kodály. I am told these composers are working on the same lines as Schönberg, Stravinsky and Scriabine. Perhaps this will best explain the character of the piece. They sounded to me like bad Liszt. Mr. Liebich played with notable technical skill and evident earnestness, perhaps with too much earnestness in such shiftless music."

This is Mr. "Lancelot" in a characteristically witty and brilliant mood. It is not necessary to think; it is not even necessary to correct other people's blunders. You simply write what you feel. It is nothing to this critic that Schönberg, Stravinsky and Scriabine do not work on the same lines and that they have only one thing in common: a sweet ambition to express themselves.

Now I have no tremendous admiration either for Mr. Bartók or Mr. Kodály. But this I do say, that if the 'Reference' critic will point out one single phrase of the music heard in the Aeolian Hall the other evening that bears any but the faintest resemblance to Liszt I will raise my hat. The method of both composers is harmonically at variance with that of Liszt. Liszt's sense of harmony was primarily voluptuous; that sense is entirely absent in the work of these artists. Neither, of course, will suffer great agonies from their critic's scorpion; they are much more likely to suffer from the snobism of their friends.

One or two points in the Introductory Note printed in Mr. Liebich's programme puzzle me. In discussing Bartók and Kodály, Mrs. Liebich, the author of the Note, says that while their compositions "are distinctly national in idiom, they are also extremely personal. These composers have so closely incorporated their own language into that of the folk and with the older and more remote influences felt by the folk it is extremely difficult to separate one from the other." What, I wonder, are these older and more remote influences which Mrs. Liebich refers to in italics? How many influences are there, how old, and how remote? What are those influences, and how is the author aware that "the folk" are conscious of them? In what precise way are those influences incorporated with the art work of Bartók and Kodály? I am not satisfied with a loose reference to the "subjective" quality of their compositions. Nor am I quite satisfied with the general statement Mrs. Liebich makes, after mentioning Bartók's original chord-construction, that both he and his compatriot "are working on the same lines as Schönberg, Stravinsky, Scriabine, the younger English composers, and the Frenchmen, which is a proof of the qualitative affinity, the fundamental unity of the art." I have already suggested above that the one thing the three S.'s share in common is the desire for self-expression.

It would, I feel, have added considerably to the analytical value of Mrs. Liebich's Note had she mentioned by name those younger English composers and those Frenchmen to whom she refers. Surely, too, in her concluding paragraph, which runs: "The contemporary history of music is but a condensation, an echo, of its past from its remotest origin, while at the same time it is even now resonant of all that the future will reveal," she means the history of contemporary music?

The Future of the Women's Movement. By Mrs. H. M. Swanwick. (Bell. 2s. 6d. net.)

It is impossible to get any clear idea from this farrago of debating points, prophecy, and personal predilections. Mrs. Swanwick may suppose that the future is her own to mould as she likes; but it would be just as easy and as useless to prophesy the opposite. We have seen that an epicene literature, for example, has resulted in the degradation of literature; and we have good reason to suppose that an epicene politics would follow the same course. Certainly, in spite of all that has been said and written on this subject, Mrs. Swanwick is incapable of admitting facts. She states again the old fallacies that sex does not differentiate the sexes; that women can and will develop the non-sexual characters, and, of course, retain the sexual characters; that the home and the family will be destroyed by the simple process of destroying both; that sex-antagonism will be abolished when the men have triumphed over the men, and have allotted them their insignificant place in the scheme of creation; and so on. Nature itself will be improved upon, for the mothers of children will not necessarily be the nurturers of them; there will be expert nurses, probably celibate, who will specialise in this subject and thus give the mother an opportunity to take an interest in foreign affairs or the social evil. There will be expert servants and experts on male aspects, and expert husbands, let us hope; and altogether the women are going to have a glorious time, and all that the husband will have to do will be to pay for it. Women, we are told, "cut the cackle and get to business sooner"; so we can expect some prompt legislation when they get into Parliament. The man's woman will be abolished; the woman's woman will be invented and perpetuated; and, of course, all the anti-Feminists, from Sir Almroth Wright to Mr. Bellfort Bax, are only converting the public to Feminism. It would be a small matter to wake Mrs. Swanwick from such a pleasant dream, for she really is very enthusiastic, and she thinks that she is convincing; and, after all, women are not women and men are not men, but complementary beings and very similar, not diverse so profusely as the author thought. And they will work together ever so much better if women call the tune and men pay the piper; and there is undoubtedly a good time coming for women, if only they can persuade (not compel, as the militants are trying to do) men to let them have their own way. Oh I bless their hearts!

A Naturalist in Western China. By Ernest H. Wilson. (Methuen. 2 vols. 30s. net.)

We are sure that Mr. Wilson has not chosen the best method of stating the results of his travels. The information amassed during eleven years' exploration, in a country whose flora alone contains about 15,000 species, half of which are indigenous, surely needed summarising, classifying, and abstracting before being offered to the public. Some of the questions that arise, such as the question of the geographical distribution of species of flora, are of such importance to scientific theory that it is tantalising to be told casually that some of the species of flora in Western China are only to be found elsewhere in the world on the Atlantic side of the North American Continent. It is certainly the case stated in this work, of which so much is new, is so large in volume and so varied in character, that something more than the method of the itinerary is needed for its effective display. The itinerary has only an autobiographical value: in Browning's "Karshish," for example, who bothers about "Judea's gum-tragacanth," or the "blue-flowering borage, the Aleppo sort?" Yet Mr. Wilson, with all this matter on hand, brings it in casually as items in a catalogue; for example, "the day's journey commenced in a steady ascent to the top of a ridge followed by the usual precipitous descent. Hereabouts Staphylea holocarpa, a small, very floriferous tree, with both white and pink flowers, is very common and most strikingly beautiful," etc. Facts of all kinds and of varying values are jumbled together in such a narrative, in such confusion that even an index does not avail to discover their situation; with the consequence that we could as quickly discover them by exploring China for ourselves as by searching Mrs. Wilson's book. This is a lamentable result of such industry as is represented by the 500 pages and 110 illustrations of these two volumes; and we recommend the Darwinian method to the consideration of Mr. Wilson. Let him write the abstract first, and publish the information in a number of separate volumes; and thus do what presumably he wishes to do, make Western China intelligible to Europeans.

AN UP-TO-DATE NOVELETTE.

[As the new ideas in Morality are being grasped even by the lowest orders, it is time that the obscure writers, who devote their lives to the upliftment of servant-girls and washerwomen by providing a literature for them, should produce a novelette of a new type. An attempt is here made to supply a real need, and it is hoped that this will herald the dawn of a new era in the art of noveletic writing.]

"My mistress gave me instructions to send you straight up to her boudoir as soon as you came, sir." Thus spake her butler, as he helped Hugh Clandon, the rising young solicitor, to divest himself of his outer garment and lay him reclining upon the crimson couch in voluptuous ease. Neither spoke, and the silver clock—fearing the sound of its own voice—tapped a little lower.

"Thoughtful boy," murmured Mrs. Dairst, who was standing in the hall, looking like Bernard Shaw when the public refuse to take him seriously. "How can you be so flippant to stand knocking outside closed doors nowadays?" Standing in the hall of Mrs. Dairst's suburban villa, thus spake her, as she helped Hugh Clendon, the rising young solicitor, to divest himself of his outer garments with an air of forced nonchalance. And strange! As if he were indeed a sinner blindly ignored our hero's fond opinion. The last recesses of the public heart. It can't be true, but thus the story goes, he owed the lack of falling on his feet unto the virtue of his certain seat!

II.

For months our friend, the Rt. Hon. Joseph Smythe, Though now a Privy Councillor, would write As silent in the Cabinet he sat
While my Lord This, Sir George, and Sir George That Monopolised the business of the State;
And strange! As if he were indeed a sinner Blindly ignored our hero's fond opinion That mattered not, but by unlucky fate Our worthy Governors ignored as well That Labour had discovered, sad to tell, A weapon in the sympathetic strike. So when to gain some fanciful redress It plughed the country in a woolly mess. Something, they found, had to be done, Dislike it as they might. Perhaps on that account, or else to fix a scapegoat (after Blount, The venerable Keeper of the FY),
Propounded the more venerable pill—
His certain nostrum for all weights and ages— Infinitesimal increase in wages. The Premier asked our friend, as he presided Over the very Board therein concerned, If he had naught to say—had he decided How should the course of Government be turned?

III.

Alas! I fear some evil genius leapt Within our Councillor that day, Or may be, grievances, long brooded, swept The tide-gates of his will away.
But hear his words, delivered while his eye Appeared to probe some undetermined thing But hear his words, delivered while his eye Appeared to probe some undetermined thing. "My Lord would raise the hireling's slender wage, Heedless that prices are controlled by sage And he was thought to mutter "Well advised! How should the course of Government be turned?"

Henceforth I see a newer England rise.

He found a country town to represent
Whose sons of toil shall not be sons of pain,
Who now control, by some annuity
A nation truly prosperous and blest

We must not palliate, as oft before,
A nation truly prosperous and blest
A weapon in the sympathetic strike.

If he had naught to say—had he decided How should the course of Government be turned?

IV.
Surprise came slow, but never came so sure;
And here the Premier, first to re-secure
His scattered wits, assumed the well-known stare,
And blandly spoke, "Such nonsense, I declare
I never heard. If wages, Sir, are raised
'Twill satisfy the men, we shall be praised;
If prices therefore follow, as you say,
Are we not pleased? 'Sufficient for the day,'
We cannot better this tried remedy.
As for your speech, it seems to me
Merely rank socialism. What will transpire
When your annuities at last expire?
The widows and the orphans" (dear old friends)
"I shall protect until my lifetime ends.
You would deprive them." (Shame.) "And furthermore,
Have you no place for US when you restore
The fabric of the world? Come, come, 'tis plain
You cannot be permitted to remain.
With greedy smiles, I would far sooner lose
Ten by-elections than uphold such views!"

"The Rt. Hon. Joseph Sutynthe, through failing health,
Has found it necessary to vacate
The lofty post in which with such a wealth
Of diligently he served his King and State."
But he has learned to wear a briddled tongue,
And thus they swell, unhonoured and unsung,
The dismal number of forgotten Peers,
The while the Government with safety steers
The lofty post in which with such a wealth
Of diligence he served his King and State.

THE NATIVITY (NEW STYLE).
BY CHRISTOPHER DAY.
This is the land, and this the pleasant place
Where piling babe is by a policeman found.
With dimpling smile, with curves and every grace
The precious mite reposes on the ground,
In this our land where joy and love abound,
Where Christians stink, where Cant is ever crowned
Is all they give for bodies bred from clods,
And with angels sing instead.

A CHRISTMAS PRESENT FOR THE WORKHOUSE.
Late one night, shortly before Christmas Day, a constable found two bundles in Allfarthing Lane, Wandsworth. In one was a pretty baby lay sleeping cosily.
The other bundle consisted of baby's spare clothing—two complete sets. Baby and the clothing were speedily taken to Swaffield Road Workhouse. There much surprise was occasioned by the costliness of the linen, which seemed to demonstrate that the child had a well-to-do wealth. In one a pretty baby lay sleeping cosily.
If this is your full price, what is the price of souls?
Returned the fee, the goods: and left them to their fate.
If they knew it, from old Mirrors" faked with glue,
And their God is one of shoddy, and their souls are shoddy, too.

SWEETHEART.
"Come," I said to my sweetheart,
"Let us for sweet Heaven depart,
Let us leave this land of death
And with angels sing instead.

"Let us though a land of flowers
Sing our way and laugh the hours;
And the sun within the sky
As we sing shall run close by."

And my sweetheart took my hand,
Glad to leave this baneful land
But now we will brand them
With thirty bob.

"O, my love," she wept.
"O, my love," I heard her say.

"O, sweet sister of my heart,
What," I asked, "does make thee start?"
Then the laughing boy on high
Cried "O love, my weekly wage!"

REFORM PRINCIPLES IN 1895 UNDERGO A COMPLETE CHANGE IN 1914.

Mr. Creswell Fights for Liberty Demanded by the Uitlanders before the War.

BY FRED HORA.

In view of the extraordinary change of principle which the present Session of the Union Parliament has witnessed, it is useful to refer to one of the causes which led up to the great war in this country. The following extract from the now historic document issued by the Uitlander Committee in the closing days of 1895 speaks in eloquent terms of the base insincerity of those leaders who appointed themselves the champions of our liberties and the custodians of the Imperial interest in South Africa, in striking and wholesome contrast to the fearless fight for liberty which Mr. Creswell has put up against an intolerable and tyrannical Act.

Will the Unionists explain matters to the people?

EXTRACT FROM THE UITLANDER MANIFESTO, DEC. 26, 1895.

"But when we look to the debates of the last few years, what do we find? All through a spirit of hostility. All through an endeavour not to meet the just wants of the people; not to remove grievances; not to establish the claim to our loyalty, by just treatment and equal laws; but to repress the publication of the truth, however much it may be required in the public interests; to prevent us from holding public meetings; to interfere with the Courts, and to keep us in awe by force. There is now threatened a danger even greater than those which have preceded us. The Government is seeking to get through the Legislature an Act which will vest in the Executive the power to decide whether men have been guilty of sedition, and to deport them and confiscate their goods. The Volksraad has by resolution affirmed the principle, and has instructed the Government to bring a Bill accordingly next Session. To-day this power rests with the Courts of Law, and we can only say that, if this Bill becomes law, the power of the Executive Government in this country would be as absolute as the power of the Czar of Russia. We shall have said good-bye to the last principle of liberty."

For the information of our readers we append the names of the members of the Reform Committee who stood for the principles enumerated above:—

LIST OF MEMBERS OF THE "REFORM COMMITTEE."

Affairs," published on March 5, is remarkably to the present. Mr. Creswell has put up against the power to decide whether men have been guilty of sedition, and to deport them and confiscate their goods.

The Volksraad has by resolution affirmed the principle, and has instructed the Government to bring a Bill accordingly next Session. To-day this power rests with the Courts of Law, and we can only say that, if this Bill becomes law, the power of the Executive Government in this country would be as absolute as the power of the Czar of Russia. We shall have said good-bye to the last principle of liberty."

THE SOFT ANSWER.

Sir,—I am much interested in your reference in "Readers and Writers" to my work, "A Bed of Roses." Allow me to reproduce your remark:—"I am much mistaken in my judgment of Mr. Bland if his infatuation with Mr. George Borrow survives even the first half-dozen chapters of that work."

I will say in reply that if you will look up The New Age of April 27, 1914, you will find under the signature of "Jacob Tomson a three-quarter column review of "A Bed of Roses" which, though critical, is exceedingly favourable to me; you stated through your critic that it was a very sound novel; that the support of a third party skilful. I presume that, as Editor, you are as responsible for the opinions of Jacob Tomson, favourable to me, as you now are for those of the contributor singles out for destruction my book, "A Bed of Roses." Allow me to reproduce your remark:—"I am much mistaken in my judgment of Mr. Bland if his infatuation with Mr. George Borrow survives even the first half-dozen chapters of that work."

The Gentleman who writes "Readers and Writers" justifies me, I think, in saying that I should have been slated, a judging from the tone of the article: "The New Age" knows better now, and may even hesitate to print this letter.

MEXICO.

Sir,—Your article under the heading of "Foreign Affairs," published on March 5, is remarkably to the point and a rare specimen of insight.

The data I learned from referring to it do not invalidate anything substantial in your statement of the case. Carranza has never been a general, and he did not revolt with a portion of the army. The latter, to the last man, has been faithful to the Government, and hates the soi-disant constitutionalists, which have an army of their own, a privileged assembly of brigands. They answer to the description of Villa, Zapata, Cenoveo de la O, and el Agachado, all of them escaped convicts.

Carranza has quite a legion of them, as he had received plenty of money from the National Treasury to pay his recruits when he was the Governor of Coahuila. These irregulars, his "guarda imperial," were his supporters when he decided to start his revolt.

He was defeated in Coahuila, his native province, and now he depends on the support of Villa and Obregon. It will not take long before we see Carranza turned over by Villa, the most wonderful brute that ever existed. But Villa will be defeated, and the only refuge in the United States, the Mexican Government will ask the extradition of the bandit to punish the murder of Benton. If the United States do not grant Villa's extradition, England is sure to make a representation and obligé the Chief Hypocrite of America to surrender his rascal protege.

 COMMITTEE FOR THE REPEAL OF THE BLASPHMY LAWS.

Sir,—A public meeting to advocate the abolition of the Blasphemy Laws has been arranged to take place on the 20th inst. at Essex Hall. I enclose copies of the Circulars, and my Committee would feel most grateful if you would kindly notice our meeting in the valuable columns of The New Age.

Thanking you in anticipation.

DENSHAWAI,

Sir,—Mr. Marmaduke Pickthall, for some unknown reason, has assumed that I am anti-Turkish. This view is as startling to me as Mr. Pickthall's is to me of the many of the circumstances which led to the Denshawai incident.

One of those few Englishmen who attended the welcome banquet to the Turkish Members of Parliament who visited London after Abdul Hamid had been removed; and at the time of the attack upon Turkey by Austria, I was firmly believing that what was being done was on the Turkish side. But the fact that the reformed Turks in recent years have adopted most of the inhuman practices common to the conduct of Christian nation warfare and politics has somewhat modified that attitude.

THE WHITE SLAVE ACT.

Sir,—I beg to be allowed to comment on the following pamphlet :-

FLOGGING UNDER THE "WHITE SLAVE TRAFFIC" ACT.

The following memorial, signed by a number of representative women, has been forwarded to the Prime Minister through the Humanitarian League, 35, Chancery Lane, London :-

Sir,—In the Criminal Law Amendment (White Slave Traffic) Act, passed rather more than a year ago, there was nothing which attracted much attention at the time than the provision for flogging male offenders for certain crimes against women, while female offenders remained exempt. We note that attempts are now being made to amend this provision. It is absolutely false to suggest that what attracted the favourable attention of the House of Commons was in any way the flogging clause; and not by their silence only they consented! There are some among them who circulated the vilest stories of white slavery. The Act has been draped even more of a sinister revelation, for it proves that they are not merely female, fictionalists, and blindly cruel, but are open under circumstance to a touch of reason.

The circumstances is the damage done to the suffrage movement by the passing of the White Slave Act. It is known everywhere now that there was no evidence before the House of Commons. I said so in this New Age at the time. I had my information from the House of Commons, and many of the above signatories must have had the same. I ask them, at least duty to have had it. I know that some of them read my letters published in these columns! Not one moved, except in the direction she wanted to move in. A hateful pack! They utilise to their myopic eyes to be serviceable to their political propaganda—nothing is seen to be too vile until it turns against them: then, with one voice, they are friends and champions—and they are just a group of earnest and large-hearted women striving to uplift humanity! They are not, as are egoists and jobbers. Humanity only appeals to them if it can serve their turn. I have proved this. And most of them are notorious supporters of the worst legislation of recent years. Through their influence, it has become a quite respectable occupation for regiments of women to hunt down naughty little children and to drag thousands in every year to the police-court and the reformatory. Through them, the Bill against the feeble-minded was helped to become law, with all its cruel possibilities. One really must get these Poor in hand, you know; it makes for jobs for women! Through them the White Slave Act, with all clauses, was passed. Let us preserve from their power!

And now they come bleating about the flogging clause! If there had been two drops of humanity among them, we should have heard their voices before the Act was passed; for flogging is no more and no less brutal and degrading to-day than it was a year ago, when Our Cause seemed to be gaining such an unexampled triumph. Then they were selfish and mad enough to give support to cruel, gigging lawyers like Judge Darling, who was paid for quite impartially. They have not seen them breaking his windows for his long, list of severities to men. I have not heard them protest against him at all until the case of Julia Decies came along. It would never do to attract attention to the many men uninfected and not homicidal, bank-clerks of one crime, and so on, who are sent for deadly terms of imprisonment; only the case of women is hard, too hard for human bearing. But I would make my soul that some of the signatories to the pamphlet would take Julia Decies and that she up for ever if they had the power, and that most of them would stick her in a lock-hospital for all the years necessary to cure her, and, even after, keep her under surveillance. She might conceivably prefer the comparative sympathy of a prison to that of a refuge home: at least, the wardresses are not self-appointed savours with iron hands under the velvet glove.

Things come round. I prophesied that the suffragists would find cause to regret their lying orgy of Christmas twelve-month. That terrible spectacle was enough to make one hate and fear females. I confess that it filled me with horror and distrust from which I shall never recover. But it is something of a palliation to behold this pamphlet; for while those issuing it, the inference may perhaps be drawn that those hypocrites and batteners on female discontent are aware of some reacting vexation among women in general to have behaved so badly.

BEATRICE HASTINGS.
Sweden.

Sir,—The awakening of national feeling is one of the most important facts in Swedish politics of recent years. The breaking-up of the National Liberal party, and its disintegraion in 1905 is the beginning of the departure for the new era in our national history, and, the new period being as yet hardly in its teens, it will have to understand that the old order has come to an end and that a new order has come out healthy and sane. For the outbursts of patriotism of to-day are, at their best, sickly nationalism, at their worst, insane militaristic Chauvinism. The manifestations of the nationalism are happily confined to the upper and the landed classes of the population which, of old, considered themselves as the governing section of the nation. The General Election of 1910, which doubled the electorate, caused the “landslide” at the General Election in 1911, thereby securing the 102 Liberals and their 48 Democratic opponents the overwhelming majority over the 67 Conservatives in the Lower House, overthrowing the Conservative Cabinet of Lindman, and reinstating, for the second time, Staaff at the head of the Government.

But first some words about the scare-mongering of the last two years. Only from Russia the peace of Sweden is likely to be imperilled, either directly by assault, or indirectly by a war between Russia and Germany or England. Now, the former alternative is unlikely, and will surely be avoided by the Great Powers. In certain quarters in Sweden this is an axiom, inevitable, impending! To Sven Hedin the merit of this state of things is principally to be attributed. This successful geographical advertiser is intellectually a child and politically an imbecile, and therefore he is feasted by officers, bureaucrats, the aim is clear enough, they desire to carry out his pledge to solve the question of defence once and for ever. But in the eyes of women a national hero,. He is the scare-monger, the Stockholm lawyer and the radical Verdandist politician works hand in hand with the Anti-Liberalism of the royalistically-educated upper classes.

One week after the Peasants' Progress the Cabinet resigned, and on the 28th occurred some gatherings of people who cheered the King, Staaff, the Republic—no riots, yet not the slightest public disturbances, which is almost the rule in Stockholm. No mob exists. Here is poverty, bad housing, drunkenness, destitution, perhaps pauperism, but the poorer people are the most orderly in the town, the working men are perfectly disciplined and self-possessed—excesses take place in the fashionable restaurants! The Swedes are of a national disposition, they dislike bombastic outbursts, and are liable to smile at fierce gestures and passionate bias, but they lend their ears to sober arguments and logical conclusions, and, consequently, they look to Staaff and the Stockholms to govern this country. From these reasons the General Strike in 1909 was entirely peaceful. Le Bon's psychology of masses does not seem to hold water in these northern latitudes!

Anyway, the King's Cabinet was formed; the men who are to carry out his pledge to solve the question of defence once and for ever are a collection of capitalists and bureaucrats, the aim is clear enough: Labour is the real enemy! To-day the Diet has been dissolved, a General Election will be held in a month or two, but whether the King's position will be strengthened after the elections is very uncertain. It is weak enough already. Day by day the Conservatives are giving lists of telegrams and addresses to the King from sympathetic citizens all round the country; equally, Staaff is remembered by his supporters, and they are the King's men. But even if the forthcoming elections defeat and damn the policy of Stockholm Castle, it will take the Royalists and Conservatives of Sweden—many General Elections to learn that not they but the people itself shall govern this country.

Stockholm, March 4, 1914.

Feminism.

Sir,—In Mr. Belfort Bax's “Fraud of Feminism,” which I reviewed at length in The New Age last December, appears the following:—“Should, however, a woman by any chance be convicted of a heinous offence, such as murder or maiming, under specially aggravated circumstances, and a sentence be passed such as would be unanimously sanctioned by public opinion in the case of a man, then we find the whole Feminist world up in arms. The outcry is led by self-styled upholders of equality between the sexes, the apostles of the positive side of Feminism, who bien entenda claim the eradication of sex boundaries in political and social life on the ground of women being of equal capacity with men, but who, when moral principles are involved, necessarily fall back on sentiment, the only conceivable ground for which is to be found in the time-honoured theory of the mental and physical inferiority of woman to man.” And he instances among other cases the case of Florence Doughty, who, in 1905, was sentenced for the late Sir William Gully's murder, and sentenced to life imprisonment for attempted murder, and on whose behalf an agitation started by the “Evening News” was continued in the “Daily Chronicle” and elsewhere.

A case on all fours with Doughty's is that of Julia Decies, and the Feminists have made the best of their chances. No sooner was the woman found guilty and sentenced than the Feminist ‘Star’ came out with a placard inscribed “Heavy Sentence,” and the report bristled with repertorial prejudice. Next day the Feminist “Daily Citizen” took up the cry with an article entitled “Barbarous Sentence,” “Deeply-wronged Woman,” “Maid of Honour,” and the Clergy and the Church were appealed to, and so on. Communications from myself and others were, however, conveniently suppressed. Not to be outdone the “Daily News” merely inserted letters from indignant members of the Feminist “Star” and “Stanzia” but sought out leaders.—Mrs. Meynell, Mrs. Hugh Price Hughes, and Miss Cicely Hamilton, and now the “Daily Express” has joined the Italian “Stanzia” and the “World,” and so on. Communications from myself and others were, however, conveniently suppressed.

DEMOCRACY AND MR. COX.

SIR,—When I asked Mr. Cox whether he had ever seen the word “essential” used to denote that which pertains to intrinsic nature, I meant to imply, not that I had used that word conversationally, but that I had used it quite legitimately in one of its accepted meanings. However, I am glad to see from his letter in your last issue that Mr. Cox, like myself, deprecates a prolonged discussion upon a mere word, and is anxious to concentrate upon more vital considerations. I welcome this attitude because, after all, there should always be a genuine thought on the subject, whatever is said, and Mr. Cox is anxious to get this thought. Mr. Cox asks many questions in his letter, all of which, however, I can answer in reply to his last question: “Do you (meaning me) mean that what is common to men is less important than that which is not common?” I hope now that Mr. Cox will see that the immediate necessity of my putting this question to him: “Important for what?” For, as a matter of fact, this is the whole point. What are those differences which become important in classifying a living man, let us say, for the two callings of brewer’s drayman and medical man respectively? It is obvious that, whereas from the standpoint of humanity in general, it is, above all, important that each class should have a trunk, two arms, two legs, and a head, with the usual complement of fingers, eyes, ears, lips, etc., that which is important and only important, in classifying normal men for the callings of brewer’s drayman and medical man respectively, is to distinguish those that have more muscle than brain. I trust this is clear.

Now, in the realm of politics, that which is common to all men, again sinks into insignificance beside the differences which respond to the question: “What for?” If the democratic theory, which maintains that which is common to all men is in a state of barbarity—say, the soul, the usual complement of limbs, etc.—is more important in classifying men for civilised political life than, let us say, the qualities of ruler and subject (which generally are negligible, I suppose), then I maintain that he is confusing essential differences, from the standpoint of civilised humanity, beneath a generalisation derived from man as a genus. Is that clear? If not, I am perfectly willing to state it again in other terms; but I believe that Mr. Cox will now see my point. When we speak of democrat and aristocrat, we have, I submit, done with the idea of man for the callings of brewer’s drayman and medical man respectively. It is obvious that, whereas from the standpoint of humanity in general, it is, above all, important that each class should have a trunk, two arms, two legs, and a head, with the usual complement of fingers, eyes, ears, lips, etc., that which is important and only important, in classifying normal men for the callings of brewer’s drayman and medical man respectively, is to distinguish those that have more muscle than brain.
