LINGUAL PSYCHOLOGY
A New Conception of the Function of Philosophic Inquiry

BY D. MARSDEN

FOREWORD

I

N the early numbers of the last volume of THE EGOIST there appeared four articles under the title of “Truth and Reality.” In those articles the conception is to be found which moulds the series now under the title of “Lingual Psychology” about to appear, and of which this article is the first. In handling those preliminary studies it was early felt that the bearing of the idea they attempted to embody extended far beyond the limits of the twin problems dealt with—central and of capital importance as modern philosophy has come to regard them. It became increasingly plain that only by putting the conception in a wider setting which would make clear what relation it bore to philosophic theory as a whole: what precisely it proposed to add to it and to take away from it, should we be able to indicate the effect its acceptance would have upon all philosophic problems: those of Truth and Reality of course in the forefront. The proposed series is the attempt to place the conception in that wider setting. It may here be remarked that while the earlier articles concerned themselves only with the defects of symbolization as expressed in terms of speech, the proposed articles go on to conceive the function of philosophy as the censorship of the passports and bona fides of all symbols, no matter what their medium of expression. Philosophy—it is held—is the watchdog, censor, guardian, of the universal symbolizing activity; but because the only comprehensive system of symbols is language, and since every other variety of symbol in exact proportion to its genuineness and intelligibility will debouch into speech and express its specialized function in speech-terms, it has been thought fitting to describe the new philosophy as “Lingual Psychology.” The term is not perhaps wholly free from redundance; “Psychology” perhaps ought to be sufficiently comprehensive and would be were it not for the fact that there exist so many species of inquiry calling themselves psychology, and there is so much controversy as to the function of psychology itself that the incorporation of the descriptive term “lingual” for the time being at least is to be held not so much justified as absolutely necessary.

Here at the outset it would perhaps be usual to make an apology for the audacity, excessive in an amateur, which presumes to engage with a subject so vast and far-reaching. In others, however, apologizing in a preface has never seemed to me other than a dubious merit: an attempt to wheedle us into issuing in their favour a blank cheque drawn on our fund of forbearance; it has always seemed that the fitting place for an apology is not the foreword but the epilogue, where we can hope to find ourselves in a position to judge of the enormity of their offending. One would prefer, therefore, to save oneself from the feebleness of one tradition by stating the facts of another, to wit: that in England at least all the great landmarks of philosophy—from Locke to Herbert Spencer—have been set in place, not by professionals but by interested amateurs. Accordingly, for as much as the distinction between professional and amateur is worth, and particularly where innovation is concerned, the latter may venture with a confidence which tradition will not support in the former. And for the rest we must remain content to wait for the epilogue.

CHAPTER 1: ANALYSIS AS THE PHILOSOPHIC METHOD

At no previous period in history can philosophy have appeared at such a disadvantage as now in competing for the best brains of its generation. Compared with the rapidly increasing returns for energy expended now obtainable in other fields, its meagre rewards shrink almost to vanishing-point. The reflectiv-minded have prospects in either the arts or the objective sciences which make devotion to philosophy seem a very thankless ploughing of the sands, and one can expect to see youth and virility turn away from its warrens honeycombed with blind-alley inquiries to vistas opening wide with promise of recompense and new achievement. Yet for one perceptive observer the view of intellectual development, precisely is its present condition that which is piquant and fascinating as no other sphere is, and as no optimist will believe that of philosophy can remain for (say) a century more. An historically-minded optimist might well hold that we are within hailing distance of the same kind of transition in philosophy which at the Renaissance the Anti-Aristotelian revolt put through for objective science. Rich and generous and satisfying as are the returns with which modern science repays its devotees, it can never again provide quite the same moment of passion, and of faith just breaking into knowledge which we hear ringing through the annunciation. It certainly can mean no loss. For philosophy as yet has become wholly obvious which to its disadvantage contrasts with the pioneering expectancy of those who, feeling they cannot be wrong, are just living into the moment which has to prove them right. And it would seem it is this hour which is approaching for philosophy. The tocsin which at the Renaissance sounded for her now sturdy offspring—objective science—is due to sound for the still sick member of the family of knowledge. If pseudo-science passed away then, it is due for pseudo-philosophy to make its exit now, and men will find themselves more enriched by what is implied in the disappearance of the latter than they were ever by the former. It certainly can mean no loss. For philosophy as yet possesses no body of fact tried and proved. It is a phalanx bristling with hoary and ubiquitous questions whose presence has haunted the centuries from the climax of the first European civilization until now, until their paralyzing inscrutability has succeeded in impressing men’s minds as with something sinister which it is wisdom for plain men to shun. The question of Truth, the question of Error, the riddle of Predication, the puzzle of Identity, the problem of Knowledge, the nature of Being, the definitions of Reality—these, even as they then were, now are: sphinx-like riddles to which no satisfying answer has been given and concerning which orthodox and heretical schools alike declare admit of no solution.

It is curious to note how nearly the conditions of pseudo-philosophy parallel those of pre-Renaissance science. Each shows the same shifting and shuffling in defining its function: it is something exalted and lofty no doubt—but unknown. Each shows the same hesitancy and doubt as to its method: inevitably, since knowing how to do is dependent upon knowing what to do. A vague, blind, haphazard search for they know not what eludes, philosophic alchemists, transmitters of base metals, first principles, reality, truth correspond in each. Each has the same plethora of words, blessed words: portentous but intelligible: misshapen queries which do not genuinely impress men’s minds as with something sinister but unknown. Each shows the same shifting and shuffling in defining its function: it is something exalted and lofty no doubt—but unknown. Each shows the same hesitancy and doubt as to its method: inevitably, since knowing how to do is dependent upon knowing what to do. A vague, blind, haphazard search for they know not what eludes, philosophic alchemists, transmitters of base metals, first principles, reality, truth correspond in each. Each has the same plethora of words, blessed words: portentous but intelligible: misshapen queries which do not genuinely impress men’s minds as with something sinister but unknown.

To find our way in the labyrinth of existing philosophic conceptions, it is necessary to appreciate the way in which from—all philosophers have received the belief as given authoritative recognition, i.e. the utter intrusiveness of philosophy’s subject-matter to treatment by the analytic method. Put differently, the belief is to the effect that the answers to philosophy’s ultimate questions lie for ever beyond the apprehension of the human senses. It is the acceptance of this belief which is implied in the agnosticism of philosophy. When philosophers have attempted to explain things such as the fact that their only course was to head straight for the rocks of Agnosticism, they have had in mind consideration of two factors—philosophy’s subject-matter and its method—either of which (or both) might be held responsible for such disaster. In the foregoing comparison with medieval science we have maintained that such effect was the necessary outcome of the form given to the subject-matter; that philosophy is preoccupying itself with matter which from its very nature can lead to nothing, being compounded of contradictions. All modern philosophy on the other hand adopts the contrary view, i.e. that it is the manner of inquiry that is defective and inadequate. As this position has been steadily held from the very outset of modern philosophy it is plain that the weight of what was implied in it has had time to make itself felt, yet the very tenet that the universalizing centuries has conformed to the early one, i.e. that philosophic agnosticism must be accepted as a fact of unalterable experience and that its cause is to be attributed to the limitation of the human senses which leaves their method of inquiry impotent in face of philosophy’s ultimate problems. The acceptance of the unknowableness of the "Ultimates" concerned with which philosophy maintains it is its peculiar province to deal, is the central fact of modern philosophy: the hinge upon which all it does and proposes to do turns.

Such agnosticism has been inevitable ever since philosophy agreed to harbour the conception that it was possible to conceive of a "Reality" which should be something distinguishable from sense-experience. That the Darwin-inspired enfants terribles of the Victorian era who proclaimed their agnostic aloofness should have created such a furor is to be put to the account, not of their agnosticism but of their truly amazing indiscretion. That both they and their assassins were not at that time as it were standing on the very threshold of understanding this the classic instance of the general unawareness of philosophers as to the import of their own philosophical conceptions. Huxley and Spencer were not one whit more convinced than their most rabid opponent of the orthodox transcendental school of Faith. Obviously, had the latter believed that the knowledge they desired was obtainable even by way of the most arduous searching, they would not have fallen back on a system which laid its foundations on a basis of faith. What the orthodox held to be cause for upbraiding in the heretical was rather a lack of sensitivity, a sort of intellectual shamelessness which was manifest as, e.g., from exhibiting its misshapen members before the multitude. Open confession of their ability to know by those whose business was knowing, and in just those spheres which they considered constituted their own special province, the orthodox felt was tantamount to brutality if not insipidity, and was as it were a perpetual charge against the incapacity of an agnostic philosophy was not to be distinguished in its essentials from the insolence of a professing baker triumphantly proclaiming his inability to bake, or a weaver to weave. They understood it was not fitting to acknowledge in the market-place an incapacity recognized by themselves as inherent, to arrive at the very knowledge they sought, even though such incapacity, decently veiled in words, should form a first article of faith with the initiated.

It is the distinction of Kant that he first, and at an early day, realized how philosophy had had the ground cut from under its feet by the adoption of the tenet of the unknowableness of the "Ultimates" of Reality, and (by what is really the same fact differently stated) the proclaimed bankruptcy of the mind to penetrate deeper than "phenomena" by the way of analysis and sustained scrutiny. It is true that his approach was as emphatic as Huxley’s; but to his higher degree of subtlety a complacent contemplating of such a situation was impossible. Accordingly if he could not sense the "ultimates" behind experience he would at least attempt to "explain" them by overlaying the whole with a peculiar system into which their imagined features might be considered harmoniously to fit. He decided to regard the inexplicables as "given" a priori and working from beyond that point, proceeded to construct for them an appropriate super-structure. He did not, of course, propose to analyse them: obviously since for the senses—which alone can analyse—they were not "there" to permit of it. By inanimatizing apriorism as the process of "explanation" in place of analysis, Kant thus endeavoured to make the best of a situation—hopeless as he conceived it—to be. But to his higher degree of subtlety a rationalism who, despairing of raising stock from his garden, but determined to give something of decoration and finish to things, sets himself to the task of constructing effective little rockeries with the help of odds and ends lying near and handy. To repeat, constituted as the philosophic situation was—a hopeless agnosticism proclaiming the bankruptcy of the only method of inquiry of which humanly speaking we have any knowledge—it was open to Kant, and philosophers before and after him, either to accept the situation and make it look as presentable and engaging as might be, or to wrestle with the situation itself and, rather than abandon the method and means of inquiry, abandon the conceptions which made such sacrifice a necessity. For so before them did the Renaissance scientists abandon their elixirs and black magic; so too would a gardener, rather than abandon his garden to preoccupy himself with unprofitable diversions, not hesitate to scrap the soil which condemned it to barrenness and import in its place one different from the previous one. Fortune of the century of philosophic energy which followed him Kant chose the former, leaving it for this age, as one may hope, to retrace the track in order to open up the one from which he turned.

Since apriorism—transcendentalism—was not only the dominant conception of last century but is the tradition against which restive spirits are chafing and revolting into new movements at the present time, it is worth while enlarging a little upon what is implied in the position adopted by the apriorists. It implies that there is an avenue to knowledge alternative to the analytic one, and that the knowledge which has eluded philosophers along one path can be come up by another. That the apriorists achieve a foothold in the alternative path are simple if curious. The searchers after Truth, having desired to find it but failed, promptly set themselves to the task of "constructing" it, with the result that not merely did the Truth of the apriorists arrive by strange by-paths, it turned out to be a strange kind of Truth. It has indeed been recognized and appreciated and under various names. It is "made" truth; it is fictional truth; it is creative truth; it is necessary truth; it is truth which is "Harmony and Beauty"; it is every kind of truth, in fact, except the common or garden real truth. When Keats asserted that "Truth is Beauty, Beauty Truth," he gave a nicely accurate description of that Truth which in the support of this aesthetic or fictional truth which enables the Kantean agnostics to veil their agnosticism and furnishes them with the far from mean courage to say at one and the same time that they know and yet do not know; that Truth is for ever beyond the scope of sense and yet capable of being sought without it; that Truth is indecipherable and yet apprehensible, and that the defeat which overwhelmed their search for Truth their constructive ingenuity has by some mysterious, transcendent, supersensible means changed to victory; to the end that their "made" truth is not merely the equal of real and discovered truth: it surpasses it.

"Made" truth is not, of course, the invention of the apriorists: nor are they by any means the sole users of it. The substitution of an aesthetic in place of the realistic criterion which it entails—that is, the asking not whether a thing is of the character it was prophesied to be and whether it is correct to classify it in a certain manner but whether it pleases, whether it is engaging, inspiring, harmonious and appealing—we are all familiar with in humbler realms in the guise of the Hypothesis or Guess. The crux of the guessing process is veiled by skillfully investing it with an unaccustomed value and dignity. The attempt proceeds to define the consideration paid to this modestly regarded handmaid of the objective sciences by paying attention to the guess’s superfluous attractions. They recognize that its face must suffice for its fortune, so to speak, and accordingly the guess which by general consent shall be accounted the most symmetrical, harmonious and coherent carried to the day and night of thought of the non-objective science of course the “guess” or working hypothesis does not appear in this rôle of “an end in itself,” but only as the makeshift support to which the analyst flings out a hand when his researches have carried him somewhat out of his depth. He would accordingly account himself unsuccessful in any sphere in which it retained a footing. Like scaffolding thrown up while a work is incomplete, a successful finish demands its removal. But in apriorism the emphasis is laid primarily on the attraction of the guess in itself: its structural shape and its harmonious appeal. Totally different criteria have been established in the two cases. Hence it was to be expected that the tracity and mediaevalism in which it retained a footing were absorbed in expounding or modifying or supplementing Kant’s system) has varied according to temperament. The aesthetically-minded (provided their sensitiveness did not reach the point where surface-harmonies on a foundation of discrepancies failed to satisfy), adopted apriorism wholeheartedly, and embarked on full-sailed careers as creative artists. Upon the more vulgarly inquisitive on the other hand, it was left to maintain that “never while consciousness lasts” will the chasm between x and y be bridged along that route. It is a very different matter agreeing that it will never be bridged along another, and that never will Gnosticism oust this age-long Agnosticism. Objective science has abstracted from phenomena certain of their simplest features: the ones precisely which lend themselves to expression by the extremely simple symbols of repetition of obvious and conventionally arranged units. The simple aspects have been selected for no other reason than that they were simple and obvious and easy to follow up, and that objective science in devoting its whole energies to them should have travelled space was a foregone conclusion. But when scientists and philosophers—having formerly or never having individually understood on what provisos and under what limitations they entered on their course, proceeded to “explain” the complexes of the matrix from which their abstractions were drawn by the same simple symbols, inevitably they must meet with failure. The symbols adequate to express the part are inadequate for the expression of the whole. But it is quite otherwise with the powers of the symbols which have grown up for the expression of the whole. There is no corresponding inherent incapacity in the expressive vehicle of the whole to express the specialized activities of the part which we never would have been, that is to say, the whole. Symbols of measure are only adequate for the expression of certain aspects of time and space, but language is or must be made adequate to express time and space and all other and more complex aspects not covered by them. In short, the vehicle of expression which subserves objective science is by itself incapable of expression, but language, the expressive vehicle of philosophy, can, whenever occasion demands, cover everything the former covers, while for the explanation of their ultimate meaning and purposes the demand for the services of language must ever remain imperative. So too while the knowledge conveyed in the symbols of the sciences can be rendered comprehensive and ultimate, the knowledge conveyed can be rendered comprehensive and ultimate. Indeed, the day cannot be far distant when a remark such as that recorded of Lord Kelvin, “I often say that if you can measure that of which you are speaking such Renaissance scientists, as, offended with the absurdities and stagnancies of the then existent science should have elected to preoccupy their energies in painting or business or travel. They abandon but do not solve the difficulty. For, as we shall hope to prove, experimental and biological psychology are not psychology at all, despite their labels. Notwithstanding the fine and delicate media in which their investigations are pursued, the results they obtain still belong to physiology and mechanics. It is the misconception as to the character of such results, i.e. the belief that they are psychological, which explains the vehement emphasis with which the Agnosticism of Philosophy was reaffirmed in the latter half of last century. It is what is in the mind of Spencer when he writes:

"See then our predicament. We can think of matter only in terms of mind. We can think of mind only in terms of matter. When we have pushed our explorations of the first to the ultimate limit, we are referred to the second for a final answer, and we are referred back to the first for an interpretation of it. We find the value of x in terms of y, and we find the value of y in terms of x: so on we may continue for ever without ever coming to a solution. The antithesis of subject and object, never to be transcended while consciousness lasts, renders impossible that Ultimate Reality in which subject and object are united."

One can at least agree with Spencer that “never... while consciousness lasts” will the chasm between x and y be bridged along that route. It is a very different matter agreeing that it will never be bridged along another, and that never will Gnosticism oust this age-long Agnosticism. Objective science has abstracted from phenomena certain of their simplest features: the ones precisely which lend themselves to expression by the extremely simple symbols of repetition of obvious and conventionally arranged units. The simple aspects have been selected for no other reason than that they were simple and obvious and easy to follow up, and that objective science in devoting its whole energies to them should have travelled apace was a foregone conclusion. But when scientists and philosophers—having formerly or never having individually understood on what provisos and under what limitations they entered on their course, proceeded to “explain” the complexes of the matrix from which their abstractions were drawn by the same simple symbols, inevitably they must meet with failure. The symbols adequate to express the part are inadequate for the expression of the whole. But it is quite otherwise with the powers of the symbols which have grown up for the expression of the whole. There is no corresponding inherent incapacity in the expressive vehicle of the whole to express the specialized activities of the part which we never would have been, that is to say, the whole. Symbols of measure are only adequate for the expression of certain aspects of time and space, but language is or must be made adequate to express time and space and all other and more complex aspects not covered by them. In short, the vehicle of expression which subserves objective science is by itself incapable of expression, but language, the expressive vehicle of philosophy, can, whenever occasion demands, cover everything the former covers, while for the explanation of their ultimate meaning and purposes the demand for the services of language must ever remain imperative. So too while the knowledge conveyed in the symbols of the sciences can be rendered comprehensive and ultimate, the knowledge conveyed can be rendered comprehensive and ultimate. Indeed, the day cannot be far distant when a remark such as that recorded of Lord Kelvin, “I often say that if you can measure that of which you are speaking and express it by a number, you know something of your subject; but if you cannot measure it or express it by a number, your knowledge is of a sorry kind and hardly satisfactory," will be interesting as an instance of how philosophers—and scientists the moment they stepped one inch outside their own limited track—erred and strayed in the darkness which was before philosophy became alive to the character of its office and function.

Whereas the mechanical and biological "psychologists" expressed by abandonment their disesteem of a philosophy unamenable to the analytic method, the pragmatists expressed theirs in a genial smudging and an assumption of the attitude of the "plain common man." While the apriorists whom they sought to improve upon contented themselves with ingenious manipulations of the blunted commonplace and unsubtilized concepts they found ready to hand, the pragmatists unconsciously outdid them by investing the "plain man" with a lucidity which from the usage of the man in the street was new to them. By giving voice to the sort of disrespect which the crowd commonly feels for philosophy's finespun absurdities, they believed they had performed for it such services as it stood in need of. Why hunt for truth? they asked. "Truth is what we have a chance to try out; what else is truth, and the description applies so universally that it is pointless to apply it to anything in particular. Notwithstanding their vivacity and quickening common sense, the pragmatists failed to see that what philosophy needed was not less subtlety but more. How little insight existed toward the real fundamental weaknesses! The apriorist position is made evident by the fact that they actually conceived as its remedy an accentuation of its fundamental weakness. They proceeded to make its proposition of a "fictional" truth the central plank of their own platform. With them pre-eminently, truth was to be "made" not found, and it is one of the delusive ironies of the situation that they should have earned the reproaches of the traditional school in the main on account of their advocacy of this tenet which the traditionalists themselves maintained more wisely just because more suavely.

A last word on the Intuitionism latterly associated with the philosophy of M. Bergson. Professor Bergson's view is of special interest in this survey because of the emphasis with which he stresses the impotency of analysis in contrast with the "method of intuition" which he himself advocates. With M. Bergson it is advisable, before proceeding to set a value on his depreciation of the analytic method, to note the relation in which he stands to modern philosophy generally. Primarily, he is an apriorist, which by a necessary implication means that he is an agnostic of the discreet order. It is therefore the reverse of his intention to doubt or question the agnostic assumption, but he sees just as Kant saw the necessity for providing an alternative approach to truth when the analytic method is closed. Essentially he follows the transcendentalism of Kant, but feels that that mysterious route would be none the worse for a little more precision of description. He enlarges accordingly, and maintains that the transcendental route is the intuitive one; and though beyond emphasizing the label he does not tell us much concerning it, he seems to indicate that it is the way of the vital and the passionate onslaughts upon analysis. One finds indeed that when the dust raised by praising intuition and damning analysis has somewhat settled, intuition's advocate has little to tell us that is valuable in the sense of being penetrating either about intuition or analysis, and that such part of his swift popularity as has not been due to his great literary skill has to be accounted for by the fact that he has come as a welcome anathema to the bankrupt analytic method, which though established is on all sides unspARINGLY challenged. For what is intuition but a foreing of the pace of analysis, so that when the fertilizing agency of the analysing attention has brought the new feature to a stage still too immature to be grasped easily and as a whole, the observing senses clutch it by the hair, so to speak, as it threatens to settle back into the nebulous vagueness out of which momentarily it has stood out defined and clear. In short, intuition is not opposed to analysis; it is merely one way of analysis and that scarcely its most satisfying. For analysis, which is capable of forcing into evidence that incipient and transient growth, persevered in, is capable of bringing it to the mature stage at which it can be scrutinized and further fertilized at leisure, and the violent and convulsive efforts become as unnecessary as they are undesirable.

It is to be noted that all these types of philosophic theory are united in one particular; they assume the unanswerable; a consequent assertion of the inadequacy of the analytic method; its abandonment therefore, and the fruitless search for a substitute. On a like principle with that which makes grapes sour which are hung too high, a belittling of the method of analysis has somewhat settled, intuition's impotency in contrast with the "method of analysis," which is capable of forcing into evidence that incipient and transient growth, persevered in, is capable of bringing it to the mature stage at which it can be scrutinized and further fertilized at leisure.
static and dead, but under it begin to show those continuous changes of appearance we call development. It is the application of the rich, manuring energy of life and mind in concentrated form. For while its agency is the living energy of mind which impregnates with change and growth everything it touches, its manner of activity (which is its distinction) is mind in concentration. The notion that its activity means just a disintegration of a composite whole into its constituent parts and that by analysing a subject we arrive at a predicate which contains merely the sum-total of the parts of the object with which we started fails to appreciate the true features of the observing process, and it is indeed utterly refuted by the growth in the world's multiplicity and richness. Exactly as the tree is not in the seed but—given devotion and care—is capable of being developed out of it, so in analysis: at the outset the subject does not contain the predicate but, given the fertilizing energy of mind, above all in the concentrated strength in which it appears in analysis, then out of the subject can be grown such a wealth of predicates as might beggar the imagination of a magician. To the truth of which statement the wealth of modern science, which represents the effects of analysing energy as applied only to the simplest of nature's aspects, is effective witness. Accordingly, far from contrasting its action with the vital attitude towards phenomena, it would be truer to its character to describe it as the supreme fertilizing, vitalizing agency, creating-cause of that particular form of change from the simple to the complex which constitutes growth: just the becoming: the flux: of the anti-analyses. The course along which its activity moves might well be defined as a continuous series of syntheses each merging into its successor by regularly developing degrees of complexity. It is this development from simple to complex which constitutes the superiority of analytically pursued inquiry over that called "constructive," wherein factors are accepted as "given," that is, arbitrarily stripped of their potentialities for change which analysis postulates of them and in which reliance for new effects is placed upon ingenious arrangements: skilful mosaics: with the provisions in terms. Not one of its master-terms but which yawn between the divergent arms of contradiction—are left—we are left—no trace of the beauty men once held so light. And in these dark cells, packed street after street, souls live, hideous yet—O dispersed, defaced, with no trace of the beauty men once held so light.

Can we believe—by any effort comfort our hearts: it is not waste all this, not placed here in disgust, street after street, each patterned alike, no grace to lighten a single house of the hundred crowded into one garden-space. Crowded—can we believe, not in utter disgust, in ironical play—But the maker of cities grew faint with the beauty of temple and space before temple, arch upon perfect arch, on pillars and corridors that led out to strange courtyards and porches where sunlight stamped hyacinth-shadows black on the pavement.

That the maker of cities grew faint with the splendour of palaces, paused while the incense-flowers from the incense-trees dropped on the marble-walk, thought anew, fashioned this—street after street alike. For alas, he had crowded the city so full that men could not grasp beauty, beauty was over them, through them, about them, no crevice unpacked with the honey, rare, measureless.

So he built a new city, ah can we believe, not ironically but for new splendour constructed new people to lift through slow growth to a beauty unirrvalled yet—and created new cells, hideous first, hideous now—spread larve across them, not honey but seething life.

And in these dark cells, packed street after street, souls live, hideous yet—O dispersed, defaced, with no trace of the beauty men once held so light.

Can we think a few old cells were left—we are left—grains of honey, old dust of stray pollen dull on our torn wings, we are left to recall the old streets? Is our task the less sweet that the larve still sleep in their cells? Or crawl out to attack our frail strength?

You are useless. We live. We await great events. We are spread through this earth. We protect our strong race. You are useless. Your cell takes the place of our young future strength.
Though they sleep or awake to torment and wish to displace our old cells—thin rare gold—
that their larve grow fat—
is our task the less sweet?

Though we wander about,
find no honey of flowers in this waste,
is our task the less sweet—
who recall the old splendour, await the new beauty of cities?

H. D.

DIALOGUES OF FONTENELLE
TRANSLATED BY EZRA POUND

III

ANACREON AND ARISTOTLE

ARISTOTLE. I should never have thought that a maker of ditties would have dared compare himself to a philosopher with so great a reputation as mine. Anacreon. You did very well for the name of philosopher, yet I, with my “ditties,” did not escape being called the wise Anacreon; and I think the title “philosopher” scarcely worth that of “wise.”

Aristotle. Those who gave you that title took no great care what they said. What had you done, at any time, to deserve it?

Anacreon. I had done nothing but drink, sing, and wax amorous; and the wonder is that people called me “the Wise” at this price, while they have called you merely “philosopher” and this has cost you infinite trouble: for how many nights have you passed picking over the thorny questions of dialectic? How many plump books have you written on obscure matters, which perhaps even you yourself do not understand very well?

Aristotle. I confess that you have taken an easier road to wisdom, and you must have been very clever to get more glory with a lute and a bottle than the greatest of men have achieved with vigils and labour.

Anacreon. You pretend to laugh at it, but I maintain that it is more difficult to drink and to sing as I have, than to philosophize as you have philosophized. To sing and to drink, as I did, required that one should have disentangled one’s soul from violent passions; that we should not aspire to things not dependent upon us, that we be ready always to take time as we find it. In short, to begin with, one must arrange a number of little affairs in oneself; and although this needs small dialectic, it is, for all that, not so very easy to manage. But one may at smaller expense philosophize as you have philosophized. One need not cure oneself of either ambition or avarice; one has an agreeable welcome at the court of Alexander the Great; one draws half a million crowns’ worth of presents, and they are not all used in physical experiments though such was the donor’s intention, in a word, this sort of philosophy drags in things rather opposed to philosophy.

Aristotle. You have heard much scandal about me down here, but, after all, man is man solely on account of his reason, and nothing is finer than to teach men how they ought to use it in studying nature and in unveiling all these enigmas which she sets before us.

Anacreon. That is just how men destroy custom in all things! Philosophy is, in itself, an admirable thing, and might be very useful to men, but because she would incommodate them if they employed her in daily affairs, or if she dwelt near them to keep some rein on their passions, they have sent her to heaven to look after the planets and put a span on their movements; or if men walk out with her upon earth it is to have her scrutinize all that they see there; they always keep her busy as far as may be from themselves. However, as they wish to be philosophers cheaply they have stretched the sense of the term, and they give it now for the most part to such as seek natural causes.

Aristotle. What more fitting name could one give them?

Anacreon. A philosopher is concerned only with men and by no means with the rest of the universe. An astronomer considers the stars, a physicist nature, a philosopher considers himself. But who would choose this last rôle on so hard a condition? Alas, hardly any one. So we do not insist on philosophers being philosophers. We are content to find them physicists or astronomers. For myself, I was by no means inclined to speculation, but I am sure that there is less philosophy in a great many books which pretend to treat of it, than in some of these little songs which you so greatly despise, in this one, for example:

Would gold prolong my life
I’d have no other care
Than gathering gold,
And when death came
I’d pay the same
To rid me of his presence.
But since harsh fate
Permits not this
And gold is no more needful,
Love and good cheer
Shall share my care—
Ah ah ah ah—
Shall share
My care.

Aristotle. If you wish to limit philosophy to the questions of ethics you will find things in my moral works worth quite as much as your verses: the obscurity for which I am blamed, and which is present perhaps in certain parts of my work, is not to be found in what I have said on this subject, and every one has admitted that there is nothing in them more clear or more beautiful than what I have said of the passions.

Anacreon. What an error! It is not a matter of defining the passions by rule, as I hear you have done, but of keeping them under. Men give philosophy their troubles to contemplate not to cure, and they have found a method of morals which touches them almost as little as does astronomy. Can one hold in one’s laughter at the sight of people who preach the contempt of riches, for money, and of chicken-hearted wastrels brought even to fisticuffs over a definition of the magnanimous?

THE FRENCH WORD IN MODERN PROSE

IV. MARCEL PROUST

“À la Recherche du Temps Perdu. Du Côté de chez Swann”

In France, as it would seem, in England too, authors appear to be returning to works of long standing power. None of the books it has been my pleasure to include under this heading as typical of the younger spirit in contemporary French literature follow the slender lines of structure common to the majority of modern productions, while the work I propose interviewing to-day ranks by its volume with the most monumental of works of fiction or of autobiography (for this book comes under the double description) of the less hurried and robust past. It offers, moreover, other and more curious analogies with them, being as intricately prolix if not as direct in workmanship as is, for instance, "Les Liaisons Dangereuses," or the "Princesse de Clèves," and as self-conscious and introspective as the "Confessions." (When I make an appeal to reminiscence I want it understood that hereby I use an expedient for helping self-conscious and introspective as the "Confessions." me to convey an impression while honestly endeavour­ing of drawing parallels as though every work were the solubly influenced by, and grafted to, previous experiences.)

chez Swann" is a book of idiosyncrasies. And when to disclose the innermost petals of his heart without winning the closest attention. This is a secret M. Proust to which he has voluntarily added by every possible literary artifice and ornament, achieving by this richly incrustated inlay-work. Not a statement means an effect which may best be compared to interlacings. Like sound in a grotto numberless of his but carries a simile or two in its train, or but echoes respond to each thought-formation in a winding around the main current of the thought, winding in and about it in long, intricate and fascinating interlacings. Like sound in a grotto numberless echoes thought-repetition the same. The book—what I have declining scale—each chamber of thought opens on to an inner chamber.

The style may appear vicious with its interminable sentences, planted with "ifs" and "however," "nevertheless," "moreover," "but," "and," "for," etc., somewhat monotonous in its cast, but none except a pedant would entertain a grievance against these peculiarities which like certain persons' defects, those of persons we like, are, if faults at all, attractive defects. Indeed, these individual singularities express the singularity of the book in its sum total. The body of the book is a faithful mould of its spirit. The meticalus analysis borne out by metaphor called in to give auxiliary elucidation which may again develop subordinate metaphor, is brought into requisition in view of maintaining this harmony close-knit and strictly concordant. The author has an anxious care to avoid the slightest ambiguity, and leaves no rift wherein any stranger of a thought might find occasion to intrude. The book is his book—the reflection of a peculiarly complex, acute, responsive and subjective psychology.

An intense enjoyment in the sheer labour of writing, in actual penmanship, usefully secures a rare and indefatigable imagination. From the first closely composed page to the 523rd (the average number of pages in a French novel is 300, the type being more open than here, the paragraphs shorter) the elaboration, the minutiae are evenly maintained, and, far from showing symptoms of strain, are expressive of the author's earnest pleasure in taking. You feel that M. Proust is of those who are so essentially writers by nature that they can write around anything. Their domain is without limit, the whole world is theirs to transcribe into language-form. I will give some examples to illustrate my meaning. For the reader to decide whether this is a case of form creating emotion or of emotion creating form:

"She had learnt in her youth to careless the long, sinuously-necked discoloured phantasies in Chopin which are so flexible and tactile, which begin by searching for and testing their positions beyond and very far from the direction of their departure, and very far from the point one might have hoped their contact would have attained, and which, in this breach of fantasy, play—only to return with more deliberation, premeditation or precision—as on a crystal which might resound to the point of provoking a scream, or hammering at your "very heart."

The English language so insistently invites to ellipsis that it is hard to give an absolutely fair return for every adjective and adverb, for every light and shade:

"... of a sudden, after a long note held during two bars, he saw approach, escaping from under the prolonged sonority, drawn like a sonorous curtain hiding the mystery of its incubation, he recognized, secretive, whispering and broken, the aerial, odoriferous phrase he loved. And it was so peculiar, it possessed so individual a charm which no other could have fulfilled, that it seemed to Swann as though he had met at a friend's house someone he had dreamed in the morning and despaired ever to see again. At last it vanished, indicative, diligent, along the ramifications of its perfume, leaving the reflection of its smile on Swann's face."
A. THE "Conscientious Objector" is a brave man, one to give more than a few cold and matter-of-fact indications of the indiscreet critic's prying and does not permit song in the bird the cat killed to find it. The intimacy that what one has sought for has vanished like the link is an obstruction. One feels that so much of the book may be divulged, but to reach the monadical life-element the agent thus striving to form a humanity. This work of scissors is equivalent to making of him a world within a world, a synthetical and separate character in the world of humanity, not the parts, of an individual give him his unique isolates it in the world of books as the ensemble, and divisible aspect of a work which distinguishes and destroys instead of conveying that individual, in books, for the fragmentary treatment disperses and quite as unwontedly dissected in their objective way. It is a very disheartening task this of reviewing psychology under two names. Other characters besides this child-nature (rare are the French books own grave by undoing my bed-coverings and don my shroud over and again, we find relief on waking to notice that our was necessary to close all apertures, to shut the blinds, dig my peculiar to those stairs. When I had reached my chamber it poisonous than the moral penetration—of the smell of varnish of times to save from drowning or as a verse in poetry rehearsed insidious and abrupt fashion through the inhalation—far more it itself apparent in the form of a girl whom we endeavour a score and rendered it perhaps more cruel still for my sensibility because transfixed the peculiar sorrow which I experienced each evening gave forth a smell of varnish which had, as it were, absorbed and evaporate. I had to take it, rob it abruptly, publicly, without even disposing of the time and freedom of mind necessary to it the recollection of the particular instant when they did close it. . . ."

After some excursions in side-tracks he returns to the kiss:

"I did not take my eyes off my mother for I knew that I should not be allowed to stay to the end of dinner and that, so as not to annoy my father, my mamma would not allow me to know several times in every one's presence as though we had been in my room. So I promised myself in the dining-room, while dinner was beginning and I felt the time approaching, to make of this so brief and furtive kiss all that I could of it by myself in advance—and to choose with my eye the place on the cheek for the kiss, and to prepare my mind so as to be able, thanks to this mental start, to devote the whole minute mamma would grant me to feel her cheek against my lips, like a painter who, being able only to secure short sittings prepares his palette and, from his notes, makes from memory everything which can perform be done without his model. . . ."

It does not need to be pointed out that sentences of the kind, innumerable, are determined by the exigencies of the thought-process, though in other hands it could no doubt be more epigrammatically rendered. But the kiss in question has not yielded all its reserves of action and reaction:

"That hated staircase, which I always climbed so sadly, gave forth a smell of varnish which had, as it were, absorbed and transfixied the peculiar sorrow which I experienced each evening and rendered it perhaps more cruel still for my sensibility because in this offactory character my intelligence could no longer partake of its share. When we sleep and a toothache makes itself apparent in the form of a girl whom we endeavour a score of times to save from drowning or as a verse in poetry rehearsed over and again, we find relief on waking to notice that our intelligence can separate the idea of toothache from all heroic or cadenced disguise. It was the opposite to this relief I experienced when my sorrow was to having to climb to my chamber struck me in far more rapid, almost instantaneous, at once insidious and abrupt fashion through the inhalation—far more poisonous than the moral penetration—of the smell of varnish peculiar to those stairs. When I had reached my chamber it was necessary to close all apertures, to shut the blinds, dig my own grave by undoing my bed-coverings and don my shroud of a night-shirt."

I would not have it surmised from these quotations that the book contains but the portraiture of one psychology under two names. Other characters besides this child-nature (rare are the French books descriptive of childhood's phenomena) and Mr. Swann, are, if not as penetratingly reflected, yet quite as unwontedly dissetted in their objective way. It is a very disheartening task this of reviewing books, for the fragmentary treatment disperses and destroys instead of conveying that individual, independent work which distinguishes and isolates it in the world of books as the ensemble, and not the parts, of an individual give him his unique and separate character in the world of humanity, making of him a world within a world, a synthetical humanity. This work of scissors is equivalent to that effected by the surgeon's knife: the anatomy of the book may be divulged, but to reach the monadical life-element the instrument from which it is cut to its link is an obstruction. One feels that so much handling injures the book, extinguishes it; one feels that what one has sought for has vanished like the song in the bird the cat killed to find it. The intimacy contained in this particular book naturally fights shy of the indiscreet critic's prying and does not permit one to give more than a few cold and matter-of-fact specifications on conventional lines, as, for instance, that the book gives a view of French social customs and the subtler class-barriers which are such an enigma to foreigners, that it comprises much keen character-sketching which seizes only upon the less tangible and never upon the grosser, more obvious peculiarities, that it is Stendhalian in its searching, psychological reading, always conscious in its morbid anxiety, and that the artistry of the book consists in part in the reversal of face values, for to this author, only the esoteric is worth bringing into evidence, only the inexpressible worth expressing, only the formless worth giving form to.

MURIEL CIOLKOWSKA

A SOLEMN DIALOGUE

BY RICHARD ALDINGTON

A. THE "Conscientious Objector" is a brave man, but a repulsive doctrinaire. He is—granted—less repulsive than a Prussian minister for war or the Prime Minister of an English self-governing colony, but nothing can excuse his doctrinaire opposition to an actual state of affairs. His temerity in resisting the activities of the slaughter machine, which could slay him in a moment if it wished, is only excused by the fact that the machine is too stupid to do so. B. Yes, it is absurd to oppose military service on the ground of philosophic anarchism, for it is easy to prove that an anarchist is as much an archist as any one else. He happens to be in the minority, that is all. But in recognizing this it is easy to run into an opposite, too materialistic extreme. You cannot deny idealism all expression, and otherwise explain, for instance, the alarming progress of Christianity in its early days? There was no self-interest. A. On the contrary, they were abominable egotists. They sacrificed a life which they had come to consider as worthless, filthy and wretched for an eternity of bliss. They really believed in the immortality of the soul, ardently, with naive. To use Christ as a stalking-horse for evasion is ridiculous. For one text in favour of pacifism you can find two against it. As for "universal brotherhood" you will find it recorded that Christ considered his mission only opened to the "lost sheep of Israel." Besides, no one with a sense of irony can take his sayings au pied de la lettre. He is indeed a poet, and much more interesting than his disciples during the last one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three years have made him out to be. He is a champion of utter individualism.

B. I am frankly discouraged with Christ; he is more paradoxical than Oscar Wilde. Every one makes Christ agree with his own particular philosophy. The Socialists for example. And then whenever any of his sayings disagree with the disciple's philosophy, the disciple declares it to be an "interpolation." It is regrettable that Christ did not write his own biography.

A. In any case he is insufficient support for a "conscience," as the tribunals have somewhat brutally and stupidly maintained. The tribunals are just as illogical as the consciences; they call themselves Christians and certainly seem to regard brutality and stupidly maintained. The tribunals for example. And then whenever any of his sayings disagree with the disciple's philosophy, the disciple declares it to be an "interpolation." It is regrettable that Christ did not write his own biography.
therefore I shall resist, for until men refuse to become soldiers there will always be war, and unless a few individuals sacrifice themselves the majority will never be courageous enough to refuse.

B. That is full of contradictions anyway. The "Self is apparently a symbol representing common self-interest. A man who takes that line is only arguing about what is common self-interest. Besides, is war an evil?

B. Most certainly.

A. I'm not so sure. What are your objections?

B. Many hundreds of thousands of men are killed, millions mutilated, tens of millions kept in servitude.

A. We are told there have been no deaths of all the millions of our being.

B. About eight millions, which does not prevent our eating very hearty dinners. A man who lives to be seventy endures with equanimity the decease of five hundred millions of his fellow-beings. As to mutilation, the "industrial casualties" of modern life are very considerable; something like 250,000 per annum are recorded from the United States alone, and it is admitted that quite as many more are never reported.

A. It is said to serve, the life of a private soldier is probably not much worse than that of the ordinary agricultural labourer or navvy. No, my friend, the bulk of humanity is always exploited, and lives are wasted with the utmost prodigality. We, with our stupid humanitarianism, are equally stupidly in our desire to exploit humanity unprofitably. The Athenians had more sense, so had the Pharaohs. The people are the same, the rulers have degenerated.

B. But war wastes vast sums of money.

A. So does peace. Europe did not know what to do with its money. It did not know how to live, though apparently it knows where to die. As well waste your money on military toys as on any other. The only fine use of wealth is to deepen human sensibilities, to increase knowledge, to make the world more habitable. Well, Europe used its wealth for exactly opposite purposes. It deserves its fate.

B. You are quite wrong, but since you appear to set so high a value on the arts, what have you to say to Rheims and Louvain, to all the destruction of those institutions which, as a rule, is reserved for superior persons.

A. In any case I have varicose veins, so my opinions will probably remain unaltered: War is not an evil and far from being discouraged should be encouraged.

B. You should start a league for ensuring the Permanence of Organized Warfare.

A. My dear fellow, it already exists; only it is called the Diplomatic Corps.

PASSING PARIS

THE pre-war compiler of a periodically renewed pre-war list of the sights Paris offers inquisitive strangers, according to their respective proclivities, and in which was included one of our leading poets—that one who, according to a quaint Latin Quarter custom, bears the title, half-distinction, half-jest, of prince of poets—omitted in his estimate of curiosities a very distinguished personality, the writer and archaeologist, Mme Dieulafoy, who died while on an exploration mission with her husband in Morocco a few weeks ago.

From the point of view of the enterprising editor in question Mme Dieulafoy ought to have been a "sight," for she was the only woman in France to wear masculine costume without any of those compromises or that slovenliness to which the women who adopt it usually surrender. In the evenings she wore "swallow-tails" and carried an opera-hat; in the afternoon she would be seen in a frock-coat and silk hat and, whatever her suit, it was cut by the best of tailors. Nothing could in the slightest degree betray her sex except a gentleness of the features and the absence of a trace of beard. Nor did she attempt to force the masculine manner and attitude (and the peculiar masculine manner and attitude) which characterized the tom-boyish, defunct "new woman." She was certainly predestined to the character she assumed so naturally, easily and modestly, not, it is said, from any desire to make herself remarkable, but in consequence of the share she took in her husband's exploration work. The entrance of little Mme Dieulafoy, accompanied by Dr. Dieulafoy, at any social gathering was a circumstance one could not help but muse over, unless one did not recognize her, in which case she was confounded with the rest of the "black coats whose privilege she enjoyed of taking ladies in to dinner. The jests and anecdotes this personality engendered would fill a volume. She was, par excellence, a Parisian topic.* * * * *

Emile Faguet is another literary figure who has taken his leave. His scholarship was extensive and he ranked as a standard authority on French literature of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. He held the chair in literature at the Paris University. Some of his contemporaries could not forgive him for Mme D. [illegible] and his style in writing was often objected to. But for whatever he expressed he always had his reasons. * * *

During the era to which the war may have brought a close the most envied class in France was that of the propriétaire. The smallest estate owner was considered a favourite of fortune. Consequently every Frenchman's ambition and goal in life was to become a propriétaire of sorts, though as soon as he had attained that object he became the centre of dislike as well as of respect. A little money made with such apparent facility and certainty seems preferable to a Frenchman to any amount procured with more effort and more precariously.

Within the last two years the status of this peculiar species of citizen has been completely transformed. To be a propriétaire nowadays may be equivalent to being a proper since the rent has become of all debts the easiest to elude. And because this passive profession has enjoyed the reputation of so easily earned, or, worse, unearned prosperity no compensation for its present straightforward has presented itself in the form of protection or relief of any kind. Those whose house-property is occupied by families of the working classes are very much to be pitied, for hardly any means to obtain their rents is open to them. It cannot be imagined that such a state of things will not bring about a great change in the respective obligations binding landlords and tenants and in all the circumstances attending estate ownership.

During the 1870 war the Government decided that tenants should be one-third of the rent, the State another, landlords sacrificing the last third. But during the present conflict legislation has been put off too long for landlords not to be serious losers by the hesitation the Government has shown in the matter.

One of the severest of the smaller trials of war is the charity concert. It always seems to me to that raise money by direct means would be as easy and less disagreeable for all parties than this mutual infliction upon artists and public. For one charity concert, if ever attended, is as like another as one funeral is like another funeral or one wedding like another wedding. The same solemnity, tastelessness, commonplaceness preside over all. There are the interminable "few words," patriotic recitations and songs all as inevitable as hymns, sermons, and toasts, while the collection figures with the same insistence.

The raffle is another expedient for philanthropical purposes. This is even more exacting on its contributors than the charity concert, which, at least, claims only loans but not gifts. To be applied to every now and again for a "little picture" is the ransom of celebrities. With this as bait to catch the least celebrated the substance is easily formed. With hardly an exception M. Rodin's name is considered indispensable at the head of the catalogue where it sways with a lofty impartiality over lists otherwise significantly selected either in "official," "advanced," or neutral circles. Other manifestations claim his very presence in person but, though he rarely refuses it, he does not often produce it. He has his own way of eluding these invitations. When expected to preside over some solemnity a telegram arrives at the last moment which may be thus worded: "If M. Poincaré attends I will come," and which the vice-chairman interprets in the following manner: "M. Rodin, whose age does not permit him to run risks, infinitely regrets that a cold," etc.

For, since M. Rodin's presence, like that of other big-bodies, may be of benefit to others its display has become of ever diminishing import to himself. He was once heard to say, "If a man to whom I do not generously attend funerals for, there said he, you make acquaintances. "In my youth," he added, "I made a point of going to all funeral invitations. I got to know a lot of people that way and in a little time I was sure to meet with quite a circle of friends. But as I grow older they have their own funerals where every one now knows me but I know nobody.

Funerals used to be favourite forms of recreation in France but since death has become so common they have lost much of their attraction. In fact invitations are no longer issued in those thickly black-rimmed, printed letters enumerating the names of all the relatives which always astonished English people. Similarly marriages take place quietly in contrast to what seems to be the fashion in England despite existing circumstances which shows the French have a sense of the appropriate always ahead of the rest of the world.

M. C.

TARR

By Wyndham Lewis

[As a portion of Part II, deleted for want of space, tells of Kreisler's desperate but fruitless efforts to borrow twenty-five francs with which to redeem his dress-clothes from pawn in order to attend a dance at the Bonnington Club on the chance of meeting Anastaya again, and of his final resolve to appear in shabby day clothes.]

BOURGEOIS—BOHEMIANS

CHAPTER I

KREISLER pressed the bell. It was a hoarse low z-like blast, braying softly into the crowded room. Kreisler still stood safely outside the door.

There was a rush in the passage: the hissing and squalling sounds inaudible from the speaking of the German tongue. Some one was spitting louder than the rest, and squealing dully as well. They were females disputing among themselves the indignity of door-openers. The most anxious to please gained the day.

The door was pulled ajar; an arch voice said: "Wer ist das?"

"Mir ist das, Fraulein Lunken." The ragged and vivacious voice died away, however. The opening of the door showed in the dark vestibule Bertha Lunken with her rather precious movements and German robustness.

Her disordered hair, dusty boots and white patch on the jacket had taken effect.

"Who is it?" a voice cried from within.

"It's Herr Kreisler," Bertha answered with dramatic quietness. "Come in Herr Kreisler; there are still one or two to come." She spoke in a business-like way, and bustled to close the door, to efface politely her sceptical reception of him by her hand, some, wondering eyes.

"Ah, Herr Kreisler! I wonder where Fraulein Vasiek is!" he heard some one saying.

He looked for a place to hang his hat. Fraulein Lunken preceded him into the room. Her expression was that of an embarrassed domestic foreseeing horror in his master's eye. Otto appeared in his turn. The chatter seemed to him to swerve a little bit at his right. Bowing to two or three people he knew near the door, he went over to Fraulein Lipmann, and bending respectfully down, kissed her hand. Then with a naive air, but conciliatory, began:

A thousand pardons, Fraulein Lipmann, for presenting myself like this. Volker and I have been at Fontenay-aux-Roses all the afternoon. We made a mistake about the time of the trains and I have only just got back; I hadn't time to change. I suppose it doesn't matter? It will be quite intime and bohemian, won't it? Volker had something to do. He's coming on to the dance later if he can manage it.'

This cunning, partly affected, with a genuinely infantile glee, served him throughout the evening. While waiting at the door he had hit on this ridiculous fib. Knowing how welcome Volker was and almost sure of his not turning up, he would use him to cover the patch from the whitewashed wall. But he would get other patches and find other lies to cover them up till he could hardly move about for this plastering of lies.

Fraulein Lipmann had been looking at him with indecision.

"I am glad Herr Volker's coming. I haven't seen him for some weeks. You've plenty of time to change, you know, if you like. Herr Ekhart and several others haven't turned up yet. You live quite near, don't you, Herr Kreisler?" He took a couple of steps and looked at himself complacently in a glass.

"Yes, third to the woman and second to the left, and keep straight on! But I don't think I'll trouble about it. I will do like this. I think I'll do, don't you, Fraulein Lipmann?" He was in his element, just talking to his friend a moment before going.

The company was not "mondain" but "interesting." It was rather on its mettle on this occasion, both men and women in their several ways, dressed. An Englishwoman who was friendly with Fraulein Lipmann was one of the organizers of the Bonnington Club. Through her they had been invited there. Five minutes later Kreisler found Fraulein Lipmann in his neighbour's again.

This lady had a pale fawn-coloured face, looking like the protagonist of a crime passionel. She multiplied her social responsibilities at every turn. But her manner implied that the quite ordinary burdens of life were beyond her strength. The two rooms with folding doors, which formed her salon and demonstration—corresponded more or less to the blackboard.

"Herr Schnitzler just tells me that dress is de rigueur. Miss Bennett says it doesn't matter; but it would be awkward if you couldn't get in." She was continuing their late conversation. "You see it's not so much an artists' club as a place where the English Society of Pernice meets." Yes, I see; of course, that makes a difference! But I asked, I happened to ask, an English friend of mine to-day—a founder of the club, Master Lowndes" (this was a libel on Lowndes), "he told me it didn't matter a bit. You take your word for it, Fraulein Lipmann, it won't matter a bit," he reiterated a little boisterously, nodding his head sharply, his eyelids flapping like metal shutters rather than winking. Then, in a maunding tone, yawning a little and rubbing his glasses as though they had now idled off into gossip and confidences:

"I'd go and dress only I left my keys at Soler's. I shall have to sleep out to-night, I shan't be able to get my keys till the morning." Suddenly in a new tone, the equivalent of a vulgar wink:

"Ah, this life, Fraulein! It's accidents often separate one from one's 'smokkin' for days; sometimes weeks. My 'smokkin' leads a very independent life. Sometimes it's with me, sometimes not. It was a very expensive suit. That has been its downfall."

"Do you mean you haven't got a frag ?"

"No, not that. You misunderstand me." He reflected a moment.

"Ah, before I forget, Fraulein Lipmann! If you still want to know about that little matter: I wrote to my mother the other day. In her reply she tells me that Professor Heymann is still at Karlsruhe. He will probably take a class in the country this summer as usual. The remainder of the party!" he added as the bell again rang.

He could not be brutally prevented from accompanying them to the dance. But with his remark about Volker he felt as safe as if he had a ticket or passe-partout in his pocket.

Kreisler was standing alone nearly in the middle of the room, his arms folded and staring at the door. He would use this fictitious authority and licence to its utmost limit. Some of the others were conscious of something unusual in his presence besides his dress and the disorder even of that. They supposed he had been drinking.

There were rustlings and laughter in the hall for some minutes. Social facts, abstracted in this manner, appealed to the mind with the strangeness of masks, each sense, isolated, being like a mask on another. Anastasya appeared. She came out of that social flutter astonishingly inapposite, like a mask come to life. The little fanfare of welcome continued. She was much more outrageous than Kreisler could ever hope to be: bespangled and accoutred like a princess of the household of Peter the Great, wearing a black shawl over a garland of flowers like a savage showman through abashed capitals.

Her amusement often had been to disinter in herself the dust and decorations of some ancestress. She would float down the windings of her Great Russian and Little Russian blood, living in some imagined figure for a time as you might in towns on a stormy shore.

"We are new lives for our ancestors, not theirs a playground for us. We are the people who have the Reality." Turr lectured her later, to which she replied:

"But they had such prodigious lives! I don't like being anything out and out, life is so varied. I wear a dress with which I can enter into any milieu or circumstances. That is the only real self worth the name."

Anastasya regarded her woman's beauty as a bright dress of a harlot; she was only beautiful for that. Her splendid and bedizened state was assumed with shades of humility. Even her tenderness and peculiar heart appeared beneath the common infection and almost disgrace of that state.

The Bonnington Club was not far off and they had decided to walk, as the night was fine. It was about half-past nine, and they started. Seven or eight led the way in a suddenly made self-centred group; once outside in the spaciousness of the night streets the party seemed to break up into sections held together in the small lighted rooms within—Soltyk and his friend, still talking, and a quieter group, followed. Kreisler had lately stayed behind with another girl, to put out the lights. Instead of running on with her companion to join the principal group, she stopped with Kreisler, whom she had found bringing up the rear alone.

"Not feeling gregarious to-night?" she asked.

Kreisler walked slowly, increasing, at ever step, the distance between them and the next group, as though hoping that, should he draw her far enough back in the rear, like an elastic band she would in panic shoot forward. "Did he know many English people?" and she continued in a long eulogy of that race. Kreisler murmured and muttered sceptically. And she seemed then to be saying something about Sir's which had lately been spoken about uncharitably in the midst of his cynicism. "You are suffering! I know you are suffering. I wish I could do something for you. Cannot I?"

Kreisler began tickling the palm of her hand slightly. When he saw it interrupted her words, he left off, holding her hand solemnly as though it had been a fish slipped there for some unknown reason. Having her hand—her often-trenchant hand with its favourite gesture of sentimental over-emphasis—captivated, made her discourse almost quiet.

"I know you have been wronged and wounded. Treat me as a sister: let me help you. You think my behaviour odd: do you think I'm a funny girl? But, ah! we walk about and torment each other so needlessly. This has not come on to this place—"

He quickened his steps, and still gazing stolidly ahead, drew her by the hand.

"I only should like you to feel I am your friend," she said.

"Right!" with promptness came through his practical moustache.

"You're afraid I—" she looked at the ground, he at her.

"No," he said, "but you shall know my secret! Why should not I avail myself of your sympathy? You must know that my frac—useful to waiters, that is why I get so much for the poor suit—this frac is not on my suit—"

Kreisler ignored his surroundings. He was transporting himself, self-guarded Siberian exile, from one cheerless place to another. To Bertha Nature still had the usual florid note. The immediate impression caused by the moonlight was implicated with a thousand former impressions: she did not discriminate. It was the moon illumination of several long-remembered restlessness, renovating his susceptibility every three years or so. The moonlight for him was hardly nine months old, and belonged to Paris, where there was no romance. For Bertha the darkened trees rustled with the delicious and tragic suggestions of the passing of time and lapse of life. The black unlighted windows of the tall houses held her within, for her, breathless and passionate forms, engulfed in intense eternities of darkness and whispers. Or a lighted one, in its contrast to the bland light of the moon, so near, suggested something infinitely distant. There was something fatal in the rapid never-stopping succession of their footsteps—loud, deliberate, continual noise.

Kreisler murmured and muttered sceptically. And she seemed then to be saying something about Sir's which had lately been spoken about uncharitably in the midst of his cynicism. "You are suffering! I know you are suffering. I wish I could do something for you. Cannot I?"

Her strange companion's dreamy roughness, this romantic enigma of the evening, suddenly captured her fancy. The machine and indiscriminate side of her awoke.

She shook his hand—rapid, soft and humble—she struck the deep German chord, vibrating rudimentarily in the midst of his cynicism.

"You are suffering! I know you are suffering. I wish I could do something for you. Cannot I?"

Kreisler cursed this chatterer and her complaisance and his friend, still talking, and a quieter group, joined the circle. She always felt herself a little without the circle.

Kreisler alternately went to them a little for sympathy, and defied them with a display of his opinions. Kreisler had lately been spoken about uncharitably among them. By inevitable analogy he had, in her mind, been compared with Tarr. She always felt herself a little without the circle.

So, Bertha, still in this unusual way clinging to him (although she had ceased plying him with conversation) they proceeded along the solitary backwater of Boulevard in which they were. Pipes lay all along the edge of excavations to their left, large flaccid surface-machinery of the City. They tramped on under the small uniform trees Paris is planted with, a tame and insipid obsession.

Kreisler ignored his surroundings. He was transporting himself, self-guarded Siberian exile, from one cheerless place to another. To Bertha Nature still had the usual florid note. The immediate impression caused by the moonlight was implicated with a thousand former impressions: she did not discriminate. It was the moon illumination of several long-remembered restlessness, renovating his susceptibility every three years or so. The moonlight for him was hardly nine months old, and belonged to Paris, where there was no romance. For Bertha the darkened trees rustled with the delicious and tragic suggestions of the passing of time and lapse of life. The black unlighted windows of the tall houses held her within, for her, breathless and passionate forms, engulfed in intense eternities of darkness and whispers. Or a lighted one, in its contrast to the bland light of the moon, so near, suggested something infinitely distant. There was something fatal in the rapid never-stopping succession of their footsteps—loud, deliberate, continual noise.

Her strange companion's dreamy roughness, this romantic enigma of the evening, suddenly captured her fancy. The machine and indiscriminate side of her awoke.

She shook his hand—rapid, soft and humble—she struck the deep German chord, vibrating rudimentarily in the midst of his cynicism.

"You are suffering! I know you are suffering. I wish I could do something for you. Cannot I?"

Kreisler cursed this chatterer and her complaisance and his friend, still talking, and a quieter group, joined the circle. She always felt herself a little without the circle.

Kreisler alternately went to them a little for sympathy, and defied them with a display of his opinions. Kreisler had lately been spoken about uncharitably among them. By inevitable analogy he had, in her mind, been compared with Tarr. She always felt herself a little without the circle.

So, Bertha, still in this unusual way clinging to him (although she had ceased plying him with conversation) they proceeded along the solitary backwater of Boulevard in which they were. Pipes lay all along the edge of excavations to their left, large flaccid surface-machinery of the City. They tramped on under the small uniform trees Paris is planted with, a tame and insipid obsession.
were some distance from the nearest lamp and in the shade of the trees. But each of the spectators would have sworn to the identity and attitude of their two persons.

Bertha nearly jumped out of her skin, broke away from Kreisler, and staggered several steps. He, with great presence of mind, caught her again, and indeed had keen enough eyes, saying curtly:

"You're not quite well, Fräulein. Lean—so. Your friends will be here in a moment."

Bertha accepted his way out. She turned, indeed, rather white and sick, and even succeeded so far as to half believe her lie, while the women came up. Kreisler called out to the petrified and quite silent group at the end of the avenue. Soon they were surrounded by big-eyed faces. Hypothetical concern soon superseded the masks of scandal.

"She was taken suddenly ill." Kreisler coughed conventionally as he said this, and flicked his trousers as though he had been scuffling on the ground.

Indignant glances were cast at him. Whatever attitude they might take up towards their erring friend, there was no doubt as to their feeling towards him. He was to blame from whichever way you looked at it. They eventually, with one or two curious German glances into her eyes, slow, dubious, incredulous questions, with a drawing back of the head and drying away of voice, determined temporarily to accept her explanation. To one of them, very conscious of relations with Tarr, the vistas of possible ruptures and commotions opened. Here was a funny affair! With Kreisler, of all people—Tarr was bad enough!

Bertha would at once have returned home, carrying out the story of sudden indisposition. But she felt the only thing was to brave it out. She did not want to absent herself at once. The affair would be less conspicuous with her not away. Her friends must at once ratify their normal view of this little happening. The only thing she thought of for the moment was to bush up and obliterate what had just happened. Her heroism disappeared in the need for action. So they all walked on together, a scandalized silence subsisting in honour chiefly of Kreisler.

Again he was safe, he thought with a chuckle. His position was precarious, only he held Fräulein Lunken as hostage! Exception could not openly be taken to him, without reflecting on their friend. He walked along with perfect composure, mischievously detached and innocent.

Fräulein Lipmann and the rest had already gone inside. Several people were arriving in taxis and on foot. Kreisler got in without difficulty. He was the only man present not in evening-dress.

(TO BE CONTINUED)

FANTAISIES INTIMES

DREAM-STALKED

THROUGH the mist in the twilight of the valley, the squat shapes of the houses, silent, huddled together, like sleeping cattle . . .

. . . and the night, creeping towards them, like a stealthy beast of prey . . .

CHALLENGE

I ALONE, clambering the hill-side towards the trees that flutter like ragged flags against the skyline, turning, flitting, voice downward against the upward-creeping darkness; and see the distant flashing, like spear-heads, of the stars . . .
To Maive of Storms

Maive, O Maive!
Stirrer of waters!
I see your white feet
leaping and flashing in the breakers, tossing the blinding spray.

You, beloved!
Shaker of branches,
Scatterer of the withered fallen leaves!
Shower and storm, and foam on the waters,
Wind in the trees of the hill-sides and valleys!

I have lain sleepless in the night-time,
wide-eyed and quivering,
... the thought of you in the darkness
has swept over my heart like sudden rain.

Leigh Henry

COURT-MARTIAL

The court sat three round the table,
the president, the other man, and I.
(No one could see into our minds.)

They accused a man of theft,
and he pleaded guilty.
He had taken a silver watch
while a fool slept.

We read the evidence,
and a medical certificate which said:
"The man is mentally deficient
but he knows right from wrong."

(Hearken, O ye philosophers, Socrates, Tu-teck, and Clifford!
"The man is mentally deficient
but he knows right from wrong.")

And so we passed sentence,
and gave him the maximum punishment.
It was so easy.

B. Dobrée

CORRESPONDENCE

ENGLAND AND IRELAND
To the Editor of The Egoist

Madam.—The contributing editor of The Egoist considers that Ireland's hate of England is a "pose," and that England can "do Ireland the 'spiritual' service of forcing on her the bracing apprehension of Necessity in exchange for the vague, pervasive, delicious longing and unrest which she calls her devotion to 'Irish Freedom and Liberty.'"

One would have thought it fairly obvious in the light of recent events in Ireland that that country had proved itself ready even though its continuance demanded they should proceed to a decision in actualities of which disaster was the foregone conduction. A "bracing" influence—on either side the Channel—
even though its continuance demanded they should proceed to a question pointed out) talk had been so large, and so disproportionate to the powers of the talkers, but withal so pleasurable,
that it required a self-control they did not possess to forgo it, which are effects which steadies one for cool calculation. Which are effects that particular comfort certainly is not for them.

* * *

In instances of this kind they embark on them because they desist, or to fear, or to reckless enterprises which directly that Ireland's hate of England is a "pose," and that England men in the wide wide world were the Sinn Feiners. Men do not affirm confidently that just prior to last Easter the happiest in the wide wide worlds were the Sinn Feiners. Men do not sweep over my heart like sudden rain.

. . . the thought of you in the darkness
has swept over my heart like sudden rain.

The offence of the Government and of a great body of English their own action can draw comfort from one is more at a loss to say:
that of restraint: a pulling of oneself together: a hardening of ability to say: that particular comfort certainly is not for them.

To return, and to the meaning of a "bracing" effect: it is that it is that.of restraint: a pulling of oneself together: a hardening of which fibres which steadies one for cool calculation. Which are effects the reverse of those produced under "abandonment"—whether to despair, or to fear, or to reckless enterprises which directly in爱尔兰. In (as the article in question pointed out) talk had been so large, and so disproport-tionate to the powers of the talkers, but withal so pleasurable,
that it required a self-control they did not possess to forgo it,
even though its continuance demanded they should proceed to a decision in actualities of which disaster was the foregone conclusion. A "bracing" influence—on either side the Channel—would have been one to stiffen their power to resist a deadly

The offence of the Government and of a great body of English people, and others, has been that by their "sympathy" they have encouraged in Ireland what kindness and good sense would have checked.]

Peasant Pottery Shop
41 Devonshire Street, Theobald's Road, W.C.

Interesting British and Continental
Peasant Pottery on sale
Brightly coloured plaited felt Rugs.

Poèmes

Par André Spire

Author of "Versets," "Vers les Routes Absurdes," etc.

A little book of unpublished poems written just before and during the war. M. Spire has been in Nancy, near the firing-line, since August 1914

Published by the Egoist

Price 6d Net
Postage 1d
The Little Review

LITERATURE, DRAMA, MUSIC, ART

MARGARET C. ANDERSON, Editor

The new monthly that has been called "the most unique journal in existence."

THE LITTLE REVIEW is a magazine that believes in Life for Art's sake, in the Individual rather than in Incomplete People, in an Age of Imagination rather than of Reasonableness; a magazine interested in Past, Present, and Future, but particularly in the New Hellenism; a magazine written for Intelligent People who can Feel, whose philosophy is Applied Anarchism, whose policy is a Will to Splendour of Life, and whose function is—to express itself.

One Year, U.S.A., $1.50; Canada, $1.65; Great Britain, 7/-

THE LITTLE REVIEW
917 Fine Arts Building, Chicago, U.S.A.

Enclosed find Seven Shillings for one year's subscription, beginning...

Name ........................................
Address ....................................

THE DRAMA

FOR MAY OFFERS TWO PLAYS BY REMY DE GOURMONT

whose dramatic work has never been accessible in English. The translation has been made by the Imagist poet, who contributes also a skilful critique of de Gourmont's work. The plays are printed by an authorization given a few weeks before the playwright's death.

RICHARD ALDINGTON

Alexander Bakshy, a Russian Art and Dramatic Critic, writes on

"THE CINEMATOGRAPH AS ART"

Mr. Charles Lemmi contributes a brilliant discussion of

"THE ITALIAN STAGE OF TO-DAY"

an attempt to analyse and explain the forces in the present-day Italian theatre.

The Hull House Players, an organization of more than local fame, is the subject of a brief history by the founder and director, Laura Dainty Pelham.

Many other articles on the current problems of the drama, reviews, and bibliographies complete the number.

THE DRAMA QUARTERLY
736 MARQUETTE BUILDING, CHICAGO

POETRY

A Magazine of Verse

Edited by HARRIET MONROE

One Year (12 Numbers) U.S.A. $1.50; Canada, $1.65; Great Britain, 7/-

"The Best Magazine—by far—in the English language."—PAIDRAIC COLUM.

Poetry publishes the best verse now being written in English, and its prose section contains brief articles on subjects connected with the art, also reviews of the new verse.

It has introduced more new poets of importance than all the other American magazines combined, besides publishing the work of poets already distinguished.

Subscribe at once—the April number began Vol. VII.

POETRY, 543 CASS STREET, CHICAGO, U.S.A.

Enclosed find Seven Shillings for one year's subscription, beginning...

Name ........................................
Address ....................................

POETS' TRANSLATION SERIES

1. (Ready) The complete poems (25) of Anyte of Tegea, now brought together in English for the first time: translated by Richard Aldington. (8 pages) 2d. net (3d. post free).

2. (Ready) An entirely new version of the poems and new fragments, together with the more important of the old fragments, of Sappho: translated by Edward Storer. (12 pages) 4d. net (6d. post free).

3. (Ready) Choruses from the "Iphigenia in Aulis" of Euripides: translated by H. D. 6d. net (7d. post free).

4. (Ready) A choice of the Latin poetry of the Italian Renaissance, many now translated for the first time, by Richard Aldington. 4d. net (5d. post free).

5. (Ready) The Poems of Leonidas of Tarentum, now collected —and many translated for the first time in English—by James Whitall. 6d. net (7d. post free).

6. (Ready) The "Mosella" of Ausonius, translated by F. S. Flint. 6d. net (7d. post free).

All the pamphlets—except the first—are twelve to twenty-eight pages long and cost 4d. or 6d. net; 5d. or 7d. post free. The series of six 2s. net post free.

To be obtained from: The Egoist, Oakley House, Bloomsbury Street, W.C.

A Second Series will start in September.

EDITORIAL

Letters, etc., intended for the Editor of The Egoist should be addressed to Oakley House, Bloomsbury Street, London, W.C.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

Yearly, 6/6; U.S.A. $1.60.
Six months, 3/3; U.S.A. $ .80.
Three months, 1/9; U.S.A. $ .40.

Single copies 7d., post free to all countries.
Cheques, postal and money orders, etc., should be payable to The New Freewoman, Ltd., and crossed " Parr's Bank, Bloomsbury Branch."

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Per page £4. Quarter page £1 Is. Od. Per inch single column, 4s. Half rates after first insertion. All advertisements must be prepaid.

Printed by The Complete Press, West Norwood, and published by the Proprietors, The New Freewoman Ltd. at Oakley House, Bloomsbury Street, London, W.C.