was discussed have pointed out that it would not be legally possible to commission a graduate of United States service academies in the Brazilian armed forces unless the cadet also, either before or after, completed a full course of study in the respective Brazilian academy. Such procedure, it was noted, would be undesirable for many reasons, the chief one being that the total study period would be excessively long and an officer so educated would begin his career at an age several years behind his own contemporaries. Other officers have expressed doubt as to whether an officer receiving training in the. United States in his formative years would be able to adjust himself to the relatively meager facilities of the Brazilian armed forces. In other words, the conclusion was that such an officer would become a discontented misfit.

Certain amounts of false pride and ultranationalism are undoubtedly involved in these reservations. Brazilians, with ample justification, hold their service academies as objects of great prestige and as expressions of the Brazilian personality. In the light of this, it is easier to understand their unwillingness to do anything that could be interpreted, by Brazilians or foreigners, as an implication that the national academies are anything less than the best in the world-or at least the best for Brazilians.

Existing reservations notwithstanding, the Embassy recommends that we continue to extend these invitations each year. We may eventually overcome the resistance.
