

woman that ever lived, and in her book she lifts the lid on the papal system in words that burn and sting. She tells of her father, who, in spite of his marriage vow, stayed a priest at heart until the day of his death. How she carried the name of her priestly father a secret in her heart until death sealed her lips. A record of tortured souls and broken hearts. The following is but a brief outline of this marvelous book.

Convent education superficial. How nuns in convent schools undermine the faith of Protestant pupils. The fearful error of Protestant parents who send their children to papal proseliting institutions.

Drifting on the sea. Reaches English shores a homeless, motherless girl. The sad fate that was waiting her. God help the girl who places her faith in the hands of a celibate priest.

The power of priests over the laity, that makes it easy for Roman clericals to find their female victims through the confessional. The pious seducers of superstitious women.

Relatives demand that she enter a convent to atone for the sins of her parents. Revolts at the proposition of convent slavery. Young priest takes advantage of her sorrowful condition and leaves her in London, without friends or money and with his child in her arms.

Celibacy hardens the hearts of priests and turns them loose to prey on their weak and susceptible female victims. How father Egan enticed the girl to London to accomplish her seduction. How the sweet Kathleen Mavourneen melted the tender heart of an Irish lassie, and drew her to her doom in the lecherous arms of a heartless celibate priest.

Her uncle presents Father Egan with a beautiful ebony crucifix while priest was plotting the seduction of his niece. Why no priest can be trusted by brother, father or husband. The priest a marplot in the home.

When the seducer ceases to be the man and again becomes the priest, deserting the woman who trusted him. The heart that broke. The baby that perished from hunger and cold. The lover that never died. If you can read this chapter without shedding tears your heart is made of stone.

The oath on the crucifix. The Woman's withering curse on the priest that interfered and enticed from her the father of her child, the man she loved. True until death stilled her heart to the man she trusted and loved.

Betrayed, deserted, homeless, hungry, friendless, penniless, she tramps the streets of London, her baby with its golden curls clinging to her neck, begging for food and starving in its mother's arms. Arrested and in prison while baby dies and is buried in an unmarked grave.—The most tragic story ever told in the pages of a book.

Finds rest in a Protestant home for friendless women. The past, and the pale suffering face of her dead child ever before her. Adrift again. Becomes a drug addict. The priests of the church still on her trail. The convent gets her at last. An institution filled with the victims of priestly lust. A nun made to drink corruption from basin after dressing cancer. Private garden where nun inmates are buried. Priest kisses nun. Hearts of corruption under priestly garbs. Bodies of priests are holy. How letters pass from priests to nuns. Glass in the shoes of a dying nun, a victim of priestly lust. Banquets given drunken priests in convents. What it means to take the black veil and the silver cross. This book tells the saddest and most tragic story ever woven in the warp and woof of a human life.

Her soul in rebellion against the sin, the crime and idolatry of the papal system she escapes from convent slavery. Clad in shoddy garments she again becomes a tramp woman on the highways. Hungry for the truth she becomes a convert to Protestantism through the work of the Salvation Army and wins lasting fame on two continents as a speaker and writer of books.

Merciful God, wake up sleepy Protestants to a sense of their responsibility and help free these precious blood-bought deceived women.

Let the church pray for the enactment of laws for the inspection of these prison houses by opening their barred and locked doors to the public, or forever abolish them, as these unlawful, uncalled-for, unscriptural, unnatural, in-
