

Indecision Marks Stevenson's Story

By BILL CUNNINGHAM

So far as the public is concerned, there'll be a reasonable respite from national politics through the month of August. There'll be a few incidental utterances such as Republican Vice Presidential Nominee Richard Nixon's recent speech in Columbus, Ohio, in which he called Democratic Presidential Nominee Stevenson "a captive candidate" who would be "a captive President." There will be a running series of reports of penitent pilgrimages made to the official shrines by representatives of reputedly recalcitrant factions, these being cited as proofs of unity and harmony.

The big guns will remain mostly silent, however, until around the Ides of September, because the old pros of both

(Continued on Page Forty-one)