

ungrounded fear

A few persons worry that certain "big money" may dominate the Foundation's finances and thus influence its work. Actually, FEE relies upon no single contributor for more than 3 per cent of the total annual budget. The Foundation is free to work according to the best judgments of the individual staff members. Our own consciences, not the influence of any concentrated support, guide our work. This, we feel, is important to the successful completion of the job that needs doing.

If the publications and other works of the Foundation are unacceptable to any donor, large or small, he is free to discontinue his support. That is the way it should be.

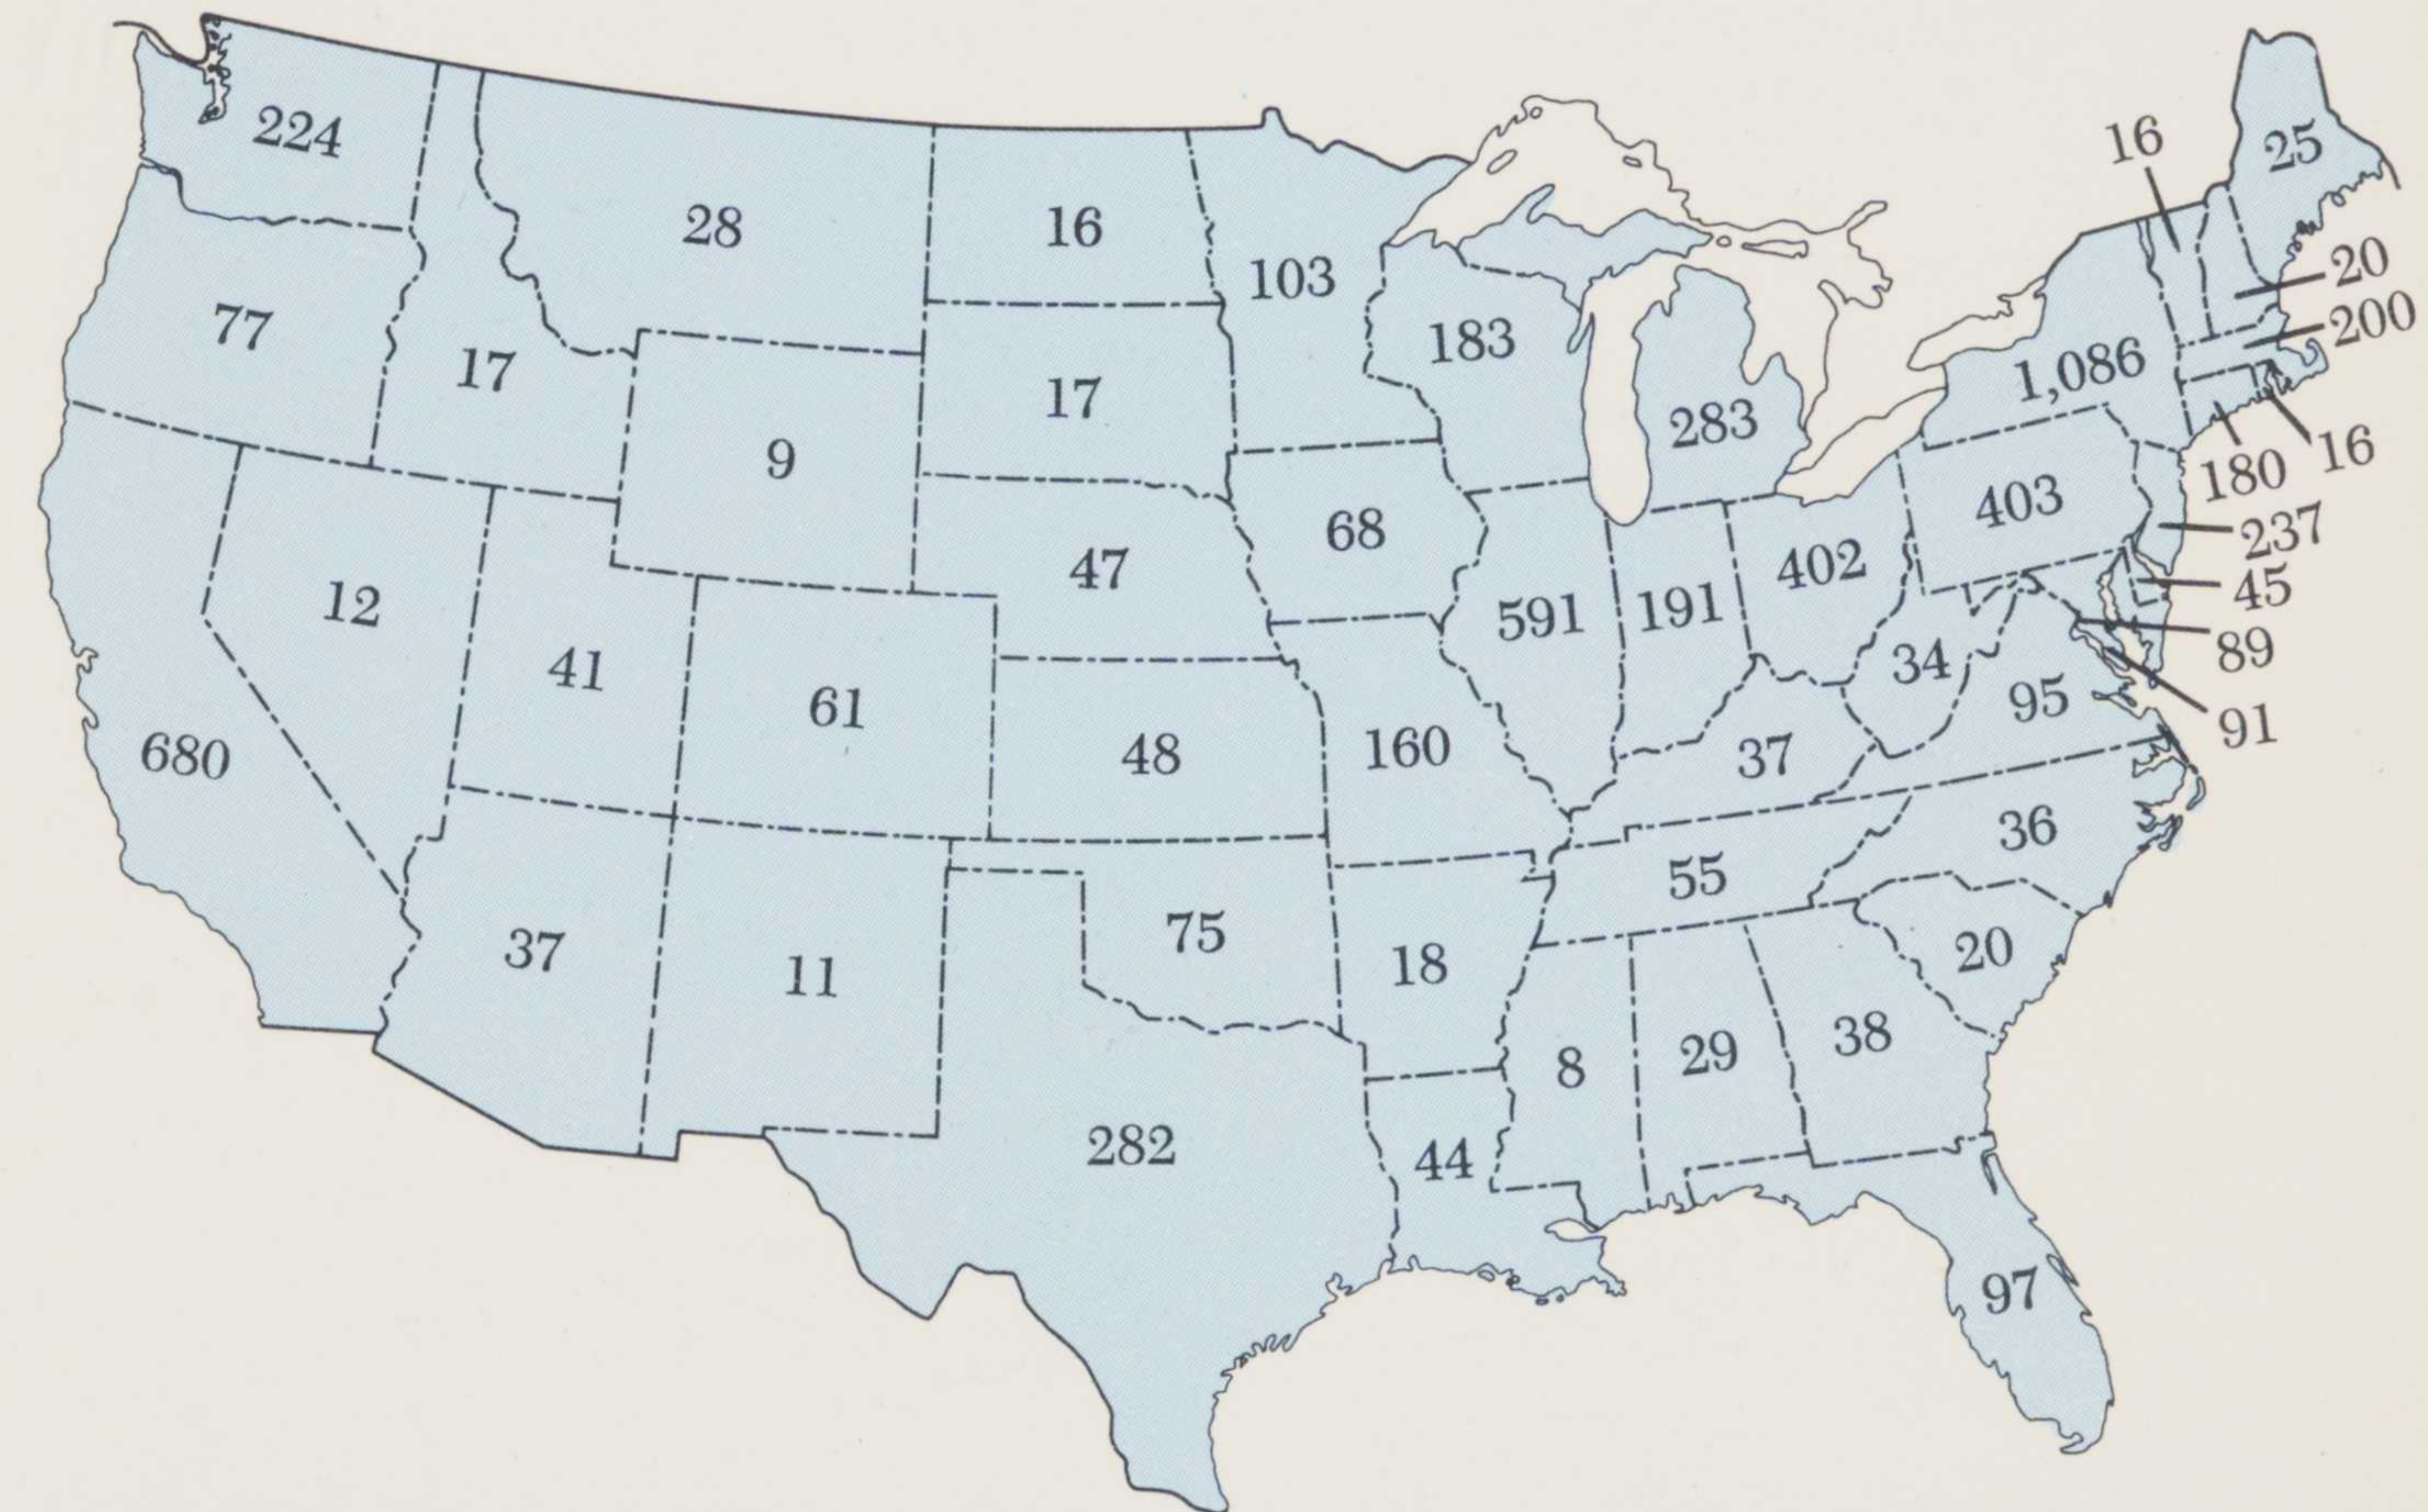

what of the future?

What does the future have in store? That may be influenced but is not strictly subject to control by the Foundation. Individuals determine when and how much they will contribute. FEE will continue to keep its eye, not on the cash drawers, but on improving explanations of free market, private property, limited government concepts, and their underlying moral principles. The responses are in other hands.

It is important to add that everyone's ideas are always welcome, even if they differ from those expressed in our publications, and whether or not that person is a donor, large or small.

Perhaps above all else, the Foundation is noteworthy for its policy of living according to the theories it propounds — a voluntary society of independent, responsible persons. Individual responsibility and voluntary participation are about the only policies of operation it has.

FEE's donors . . . More than 40,000 individuals are on FEE's mailing list by request. All states and many countries are represented. The number of these who financially support FEE, either personally or through their firms or foundations, has been increasing each month. The accompanying map and list of territories and countries show the location of FEE Donors.
