

there. King began talking about Vietnam, about the murderous policies of our nation there. He began lifting that up wherever he went.

Lots of people said to him, "Martin King, you're crazy, because that's not Christian stuff, that's not civil rights stuff, and besides Lyndon Johnson is going to have your behind if you keep doing that." And King said, "I have been fighting against segregation all my life, and I refuse to segregate my conscience."

-- Vincent Harding, 1983, from "Struggle and Transformation; The challenge of Martin Luther King Jr., in Sojourners

"It has become increasingly accepted that the risk of a major conflict is now high. What is not so widely understood is that the source of such a possible conflict lies not only in the East-West struggle for world domination, but also in the deprivation and oppression suffered by two-thirds of the world's population, which is closely linked to the structures and policies of the industrialised countries." Also: "... developing countries now account for over three-quarters of the volume of world trading in arms ... The USA and USSR are by far the main arms exporters to the developing countries, with France, West Germany, the United Kingdom, Italy and Czechoslovakia following."

-- Pauline Eccles, Disarmament & Development: The Vital Links, 1983

"We may be fragmenting our movement too much by working separately as peace movements, environmental movements, women's movements and so on. That is really the question the peace movement must handle in terms of expanding its platform. It must expand its perspective and relate to other parts of the world."

-- Rajni Kothari, in END Journal interview, April-May 1985.

"No movement can rally enough support without coalitions and allies... There's got to be some way for movements not to insist on going first."

-- Miles Horton, founder of the Highlander Folk School in Tennessee. At Univ. of Mass. forum, March, 1985.

"People like to be comfortable. Coalitions are not comfortable."

-- John Bracey, Afro-Am Dept., U. Mass forum, March, 1985.
