does nothing to address the great economic and social inequities in the world. Certainly teaching young children that it is better to resolve their conflicts through negotiation rather than fighting is worthwhile. But how will they negotiate away institutionalized oppression and the imbalance of power in society?

As you might expect, our mission requires constant exploration. A.J. Muste also knew that nonviolent social change was a dynamic process, with no easy answers and uncertain results. But we share A.J.'s faith that "the way to peace is through peace." So our basic consideration for all of our work, including our grants, literature, even who gets space in our building, is the promotion of nonviolent action for justice.

Your contribution is an important part of this process. Without your ongoing support, the Muste Institute would not be able to provide badly-needed resources to grassroots activist groups, expand the direction of nonviolent organizing or introduce new groups to nonviolent methods for change. Please help us keep alive the original spirit of May Day and A.J.'s vision of active nonviolence by making the largest donation you can to the Muste Memorial Institute.

Thank you in advance for your continued support.

Yours in peace,

Murray Rosenblith
Executive Director
