

A. J. Muste Memorial Institute ESSAY SERIES

JESSIE WALLACE HUGHAN

Jessie Wallace Hughan (1876-1955) founded the War Resisters League, a non-sectarian pacifist organization still vital today, in 1923. A prolific writer, she was a theorist on organized war resistance, world government, and nonviolent national defense. She was also a militant opponent of the draft, and helped found the Anti-Conscription League in 1915. She held a Ph.D. in political science from Columbia University, and was a Socialist Party candidate for several public offices, including the U.S. Senate.

A. J. Muste Memorial Institute

The A.J. Muste Memorial Institute is a non-profit tax exempt organization. It was founded in 1974 to further the goals of its namesake: to explore and teach how nonviolence can be used to bring about world peace, and social and economic justice.

Through grants, sponsorships, the publication of social change resources, and the development of independent educational programs, the Institute has supported more than fifty projects and has helped people bring the message of peace virtually all over the world.

The Institute is pleased to offer this pamphlet as part of a series comprised of important classical and contemporary pacifist writings. Please write for a list of the other titles available.
