EMMA Goldman

Emma Goldman (1869-1940) was an anarchist leader of the American movement for peace and social and economic justice in the early twentieth century. Although she advocated revolutionary violence early in her life, she later committed herself to peaceful resistance to repressive government policies. For encouraging draft resistance during World War One, she was fined $10,000, jailed for two years, and deported to her native Russia. Her two-volume autobiography, Living My Life, is a seminal reader on anarchist and feminist theory and practice.

A. J. Muste Memorial Institute

The A.J. Muste Memorial Institute is a non-profit tax exempt organization. It was founded in 1974 to further the goals of its namesake: to explore and teach how nonviolence can be used to bring about world peace, and social and economic justice.

Through grants, sponsorships, the publication of social change resources, and the development of independent educational programs, the Institute has supported more than fifty projects and has helped people bring the message of peace virtually all over the world.

The Institute is pleased to offer this pamphlet as part of a series comprised of important classical and contemporary pacifist writings. Please write for a list of the other titles available.
