Every year millions of animals die in the world's laboratories. Apart from moral objections, there is the constant risk of misleading results because people and animals often respond differently to drugs and disease. Many of these animals could be saved, and more reliable results achieved, by using human tissues in test tube experiments. Human tissue studies could yield new insights into many illnesses such as cancer, stroke, heart disease, arthritis and neurological disease, as well as providing an alternative means of testing the safety of medicines and other substances.

Let your relatives know your wishes and please keep your card with you all the time.
