

foolish in the process, because he is concerned, with some justice, that he can do a better job than anyone else in the race.

"It is difficult to find a parallel to Anderson—an active candidate for President who has the experience and ability to serve well, who has the stage presence and the long record of public service to be elected, and yet has little chance of surviving the early primaries."

The Washington Star

Garry Wills: "The best answers given in the [Iowa] debate? Almost any of those from John Anderson. . . . Anderson did not help himself in electoral terms. He just proved that he is too good for this gaudy and not quite reputable trade."
