JOE'S REBELLION

Joe is a hard-working man, the son of Italian immigrants who came to this country asking nothing more than a chance to earn a living. He owns a barber shop and is on his feet eight hours a day, working to support his family and pay his taxes. He knows his tax dollars are flushed into black welfare programs and no-win wars, but he figures there isn't much he can do about it. Each night he locks his shop tight--the neighborhood is changing, more blacks are moving in, and it isn't as safe and friendly as it used to be. He comes home each night hoping his daughter has not been slashed or raped. Last September they started bussing her to an "inner city" school. Three white girls have been attacked there in the past two months. Last week there was a stabbing in the cafeteria.

Joe tries to unwind in the evening. He'd take his wife out to a movie but the streets aren't safe. So he sits home and watches television. He sees Andrew Young saying South African whites are not submitting fast enough to their annihilation. He learns that there has been another wheat deal with the Russians and to subsidize it the price of bread is going up. He flips the channel and sees the American working man ridiculed on Archie Bunker's show.

During supper his son recites his most recent B'nai B'rith - approved school lesson about how glorious it is for Christians to fight for Israel and die for "God's Chosen People." His brother-in-law the policeman recites how Commissioner Cohen had him beat up an elderly lady at a White Nationalist meeting.

Joe has a problem. He would like to have his country back, but there isn't much that he can do alone. He tells his customers that the working man has been shoved back against the wall. He says he's tired of being pushed around. But Joe and his customers are isolated voices, unorganized and without influence.

Actually, the Joe-type decent people of America outnumber the parasites by a wide margin. The Joe-types must quit fooling around with cowardly "conservatives" and false-promising "liberals." He needs to call up from the hidden depths of his personality the gut instinct of RACE as the last line of defense. He needs to contact like-minded groups and GET WITH THEM, and learn the truth and how the struggle must be waged.

Over please.....
