

A. J. Muste Memorial Institute ESSAY SERIES

HENRY DAVID THOREAU

Henry David Thoreau (1817-1862) was a leading nineteenth century American writer. A pacifist, he refused to pay taxes which would be used to prosecute the Mexican War. His tax resistance led to a jail sentence, but because a relative paid his taxes, he only spent one night incarcerated. He wrote the following essay upon his release.

A. J. Muste Memorial Institute

The A.J. Muste Memorial Institute is a non-profit tax exempt organization. It was founded in 1974 to further the goals of its namesake: to explore and teach how nonviolence can be used to bring about world peace, and social and economic justice.

Through grants, sponsorships, the publication of social change resources, and the development of independent educational programs, the Institute has supported more than fifty projects and has helped people bring the message of peace virtually all over the world.

The Institute is pleased to offer this pamphlet as part of a series comprised of important classical and contemporary pacifist writings. Please write for a list of the other titles available.
